THE EXHIBITION of PORTRAIT MINIATURES NOW OPEN EXCEPTION NOVEMBER, at the GALLERY of the SOCIETY of BRITISH ARTISTS, Suffolk-street, Pall-mall East.
By Order of the Committee of Council on Education.

NATIONAL PORTRAIT GALLERY, 29, South Kensington-street, WESTERN ENTRANCE.—Open on Mondays, Wednesdays, and Saturdays, from Ten to Four.
The Gallery will be closed from Nov. 1 for cleaning and repairs, on Monday, Nov. 6, and Reopen on Monday, Dec. 4.
By Order of the Lords of the Committee of Council on Education, K.C.B., Secretary and Keeper.

NATIONAL PORTRAIT EXHIBITION.—In 1866.—The Lords of the Committee of Council on Education propose to open an Exhibition of National Portraits, at South Kensington, in the Arcades overlooking the Royal Horticultural Gardens, on Monday, May 7, and to close it on Saturday, June 30. Applications for the loan of pictures for the engravable scale by the Lord of Derby, in a letter dated May 6, 1865, from which the following words have been taken:
"The very long interval between the National Exhibition, chronologically arranged, might not only possess great historical interest, bringing together portraits of the most eminent men and temporaries of their respective eras, but might also serve to illustrate the progress of Art in this country. Many portraits by Holbein, Vandyke, Lely, Kneller, and other painters of the highest merit, though by inferior or unknown artists, or portraits by artists of merit, but not known to the present generation, are the property of persons, particularly of the aristocracy, possessing a number of such portraits which may exist in the country; but I am persuaded that, if collected, they would be found to be of great interest, not only to the families, the owners of which, though they could not be persuaded to part with them, would undoubtedly spare them for a few months for a public object."
The Lords have appointed a Committee of Advice, consisting of the Trustees of the National Portrait Gallery and other influential gentlemen.
The Lords Ripon, to whom valuable letters the successful Exhibition of 1857 was mainly due, have undertaken the special charge of directing the Exhibition; and Mr. Sheridan Muspratt is assistant secretary.

ARRANGEMENTS APPROVED FOR THE EXHIBITION.
1. The Exhibition will be limited to Portraits of Illustrious English History, and the progress of Art in England. It may be divided into Three Classes—Portraits of Royal Personages, Portraits of Persons who have died before the year 1760, of which no perfectly true and well-executed and the copies available for their proper exhibition.
2. Portraits of Persons who have died since the year 1760 may be admitted in any way attained eminence or distinction in England, from the time of the Reformation to the present time, whether natives of this country or not, and Portraits of Foreigners of eminence who have visited this country.
3. With respect to Art, the works of inferior painters representing persons of eminence will be admitted, while the acknowledged works of eminent artists will be received, through the portrait is unknown, or does not represent a person of eminence.
4. The portraits of foreigners who have attained eminence or distinction in their own country will be admitted, if they have visited England, and their portraits are painted by artists of distinguished merit.
5. The Exhibition will be held at South Kensington, in the spacious Arcades which overlook the Horticultural Gardens, and which are now completed. The Arcades, which are perfectly fire, will be fitted up especially for the Exhibition, and will be lighted from the roof.
6. All charges for the conveyance of pictures accepted for exhibition will be defrayed by the Committee of Council on Education, Science, and Art.
7. The Exhibition will be opened early in April, 1866. The precise day will be announced in the Government Gazette, and in the Public Journals. Pictures accepted for exhibition will be received or returned at the end of August at the latest; but, though the Exhibition will be open for a short time only, every care will be taken in the return of his contributions at the end of July will have been completed.
8. The Committee of Advice will, as a matter of practice, the Science and Art Department, select the owners objects, will take photographs of such pictures as they may think desirable to be engraved for the Art Journal, and will make arrangements for the engraving of such pictures as may private person to photograph, without the owner's consent, any picture lent for exhibition, but photographs will be presented to the owner of the picture photographed.
9. The Catalogue of the Exhibition will be published 1866 (and as is the case with the Catalogue of the Exhibition of 1857) the Committee must not be responsible for loss or damage, but every possible care will be taken of the pictures, and they will be packed with the greatest attention. No exhibition in 1857 were collected and returned by the same agency as will now be employed, free from any charge to the owners.
10. All correspondence, marked on the cover "National Portrait Exhibition," should be addressed to the Secretary, Science and Art Department, South Kensington, London, W.
By order of the Lords of the Committee of Council of Education.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

No. 1340.—VOL. XLVII. SATURDAY, OCTOBER 28, 1865. TWO SHEETS, FIVEPENCE

THE LATE LORD PALMERSTON.

THE relative place in the catalogue of our eminent men which will be ultimately assigned to the name of the late noble Premier it will be the province of history to determine. Cold criticism ill suits the state of feeling which his somewhat sudden decease has occasioned, and a long time must elapse before it will be possible to take into view the whole area over which his influence extended, so as to be qualified to sum up its results. During his unusually protracted official career, what he said and did more or less affected an immense variety of interests, not in his own country merely, but in almost every country on the face of the earth. Perhaps there never was a name more widely known during the life-time of its possessor; or which, in some way or other, stirred the hopes and fears, or modified the condition and actions, of men in so many parts of the world, civilised and uncivilised. It has been his lot to direct the policy of this great Empire during a period when, owing to its multifarious and ever-increasing commerce, it has held relations, direct or indirect, with almost every known community and even tribe of the human race; and it may well have happened that, as the presiding chief of its councils, Lord Palmerston has made its power felt in ways which have left some impress upon the destiny of almost every considerable family of mankind. Not till after the lapse of many years, nor before the tendency of his decisions on innumerable points has revealed itself, will even the most impartial historian possess materials for pronouncing an entirely trustworthy judgment of his course as a whole. At any rate, just now, we are neither disposed, nor do we hold ourselves competent, to pass his statesmanship under searching review; but we do not deem it unfitting to venture upon the much easier and more congenial task of considering the chief elements of character which made Lord Palmerston the most popular Minister of modern times.

Previously to the Crimean War, the administrative industry, talent, enterprise, and success with which for a long series of years he had conducted the foreign affairs of the British people, had raised Lord Palmerston to a high place among his colleagues, and had sometimes extorted the admiration, sometimes excited the apprehensions, of the country; but up to that period the venerable statesman can hardly be said to have won his way to the public heart. The gallantry with which he stepped forward to take the helm when the violence of the storm seemed about to overwhelm the vessel of the state, and when divided counsels paralysed the hands of her chief officers: the energy with which, undeterred by the perils of the crisis and undismayed by the responsibility which the foremost statesmen of the day left him to bear alone, he held on his course; and, finally, the success with which, in alliance with the French Emperor, he brought the good ship into a secure haven, laid, in the gratitude of the nation, the basis upon which was subsequently erected a reciprocal affection and confidence many misunderstanding could overturn. It may have been the noble Lord's good fortune that he was not vested with the supreme command until after our obsolete military organisation had broken down, and that he reaped all the fruits of the remedial and reconstructive efforts which had already been initiated by his predecessors. But the country, without caring to try into official secrets, saw in his conduct of the war that which it specially needed in so awful a crisis—a courage that quails not, a cheerful confidence that despairs not, and a strength of purpose that betrays no wavering, in the darkest and most tempestuous hour of national adversity; and it recognised in his negotiations for peace a moderation, flexibility, and prudence which, without carelessly surrendering the fruits of victory, wisely retrained from heaping upon a baffled and powerful foe a heavier burden of humiliation than the necessity of the occasion required.

With the manifest elements of character, by the display of which at a time when they were deemed most serviceable Lord Palmerston gained the confidence of the public, and so be associated those of a more genial and winning nature, the exercise of which infused into that confidence a warmth of affection. The noble Lord possessed many qualities which go straight to the hearts of Englishmen, and, of course, the witchery of them was rendered irresistible by his exalted station.

Foremost amongst them must be placed his unaffected simplicity, gaiety, and kindliness of disposition. For a considerable term of years he held the highest post to which the ambition of an English subject can aspire; and, in the sphere of social relationships, no man has worn his honours more indifferently or unobtrusively. Lord Byron expressed a general characteristic of his countrymen when he said, and the repugnance here so felicitously expressed applies to statesmen who can never forget that they are statesmen. The late Premier loved to substitute for the stiffer and grander costume of the Minister the undress of the Man. He enjoyed with keenest zest the pleasures of sympathy, and it cost him no effort to put himself, wherever the occasion permitted, on the level of those with whom he might chance to be brought into contact. His exuberance of spirits was constantly overflowed in kindly hilarity; and wherever he went, and whatever he did, he showed his proficiency in the happy art of putting his company in good humour with themselves. His delicate tact, the purity of his insight into character, and his all-pervading good-will, and partly to perpetual exercise, was so thoroughly developed as an art that it may well have passed for a faculty, and, save when on rare occasions he intended it, he never rendered against the tender place in a wound by a false position.

> I hate an author who's all author—follows
> In jealousy lives' tissue all he writes,

With all this simplicity and freedom from affectation the noble Lord blended a personal magnanimity and disinterestedness which, in some instances, assumed the character of chivalry. He was amongst the most generous of antagonists, and, after the heat of conflict was over, dropped his resentments, and never looked behind him to see where they might be picked up on a future opportunity. He could work with anybody who would work with him, and made no difficulty on the score of past quarrels. Still more commendable to English hearts, he never forsook a subordinate. In this respect his generosity sometimes outran his prudence, and he took upon himself the responsibility of other people's blunders, which not only impaired his own reputation but sometimes committed him to a doubtful policy. Fidelity to his colleagues was with him a kind of religious duty, and he invariably declined those ephemeral which were paid to him at their expense. This unselfishness was invaluable to his usefulness, both as a leader of the House of Commons and as chief of the Cabinet. It helped him to temper animosities, to manage divisions, and to give moral weight to authority when he was obliged to resort to it.

Pliability, within certain limits, was another of the elements of character which helped to make Lord Palmerston a popular favourite. His quick sagacity, his long experience, and his selfishness were mediums by means of which he gathered up leading opinions from all parts of the country, enabled him to see with almost unerring certainty the limits beyond which his persistence in any given course would endanger his position, and be very readily pushed beyond them. He was neither self-willed nor sensitive to such an extent as made it impossible for him to surrender with grace projects which he could not carry without serious damage to his party. He had no political theories in regard to the conduct of home affairs, and he was throughout life too much of a diplomatist to encumber himself with pledges which might prove inconvenient. Hence, his line of retreat was generally kept open: and when, as would occasionally happen, his Parliamentary enterprises were ascertained to be unmistakably distasteful to the majority, he gave them up before irreparable mischief was done. On points connected with commercial freedom, the suppression of the slave trade, and the defence of the country he was inexorable; but then these were matters on which, however formidable the opposition to be encountered from Parliament, he believed he had the predominant sympathy of the nation. In most other matters of internal policy he left it for the country to shape his ultimate decision. Happily, moreover, he had a brilliant financial administrator in the Chancellor of the Exchequer, whose completion of the free-trade system, and whose readjustment of fiscal burdens, promoted a degree of national prosperity which redounded to the credit of the Premier who had sanctioned his measures.

To the traits of character we have already specified, several minor features which were ancillary to Lord Palmerston's wide popularity must be added. He bore an English part in every active pursuit of them; his liberality as a landlord, and the kindly attention which he paid to the labourers on his estates; his wide and, for his means, munificent hospitality; the genuine sympathy with which he took part in the affairs of social life, and the exquisite savoir faire which he exhibited in his friendly intercourse with all classes; his temperate habits, his domestic tastes, and his consistent observance of all forms of greater or less significance in the estimate which his countrymen had formed of his worth. All these qualities carried into old age imparted to it a charm which was universally felt and appreciated. About the merits of the lamented Premier Englishmen might there might be differences of opinion, but about the singular fascination of the man all parties agreed. He was, perhaps, the only instance in modern times of a man holding the highest office in the State to the end of his own separate career, and by the willing assent of the great body of his opponents, and for this he was mainly indebted to his personal characteristics. The sensation which his death has excited proves the hold which he had obtained on the trust and the affections of his countrymen. There remains no other whose name will suffice for a policy, nor to whom England would be willing to give carte blanche as, on more than one occasion, she has done to him.

BROADLANDS, CAMBRIDGE HOUSE, AND BROCKET HALL.

The death of Lord Palmerston, his personal and political virtues we have promptly paid the due tribute of grateful and affectionate praise—for which the unanimous feeling of the British people—now calls upon us for some illustrations, which may remind our more distant readers of the familiar circumstances of that great and noble Englishman's life. A portrait, accompanied by a suitable memoir, is being engraved for next week's publication, along with our Artist's sketches of the Queen proceeding to Westminster Abbey; and a view of the small town of Tiverton, in Devonshire, which returned Lord Palmerston to Parliament. Meantime the views we now present will show the exterior of the three known residences of Broadlands, Cambridge House, and Brocket Hall—which were honoured and gladdened by his private abode in them during many years previous to his death.

Broadlands, his birthplace and the home of his fathers—the house where he liked best to enjoy such leisure as the cares and labours of public business would allow—first claims our notice. The Engraving on the front page of this Paper gives a view of this mansion, which was Lord Palmerston's favourite residence. It is surrounded a mile out of the Hampshire market town of Romsey, and about seven miles from Southampton. Romsey, a municipal borough with a population of 5000, is situated in the midst of a fertile agricultural country, surrounded by hills. The river Test flows on the west and head of Southampton Water, and merges at Southampton with the Itchen from Winchester. Romsey and even remoter districts benefit from the freshwater drainage of the whole county southwards of the chalk downs. The origin of Romsey dates from monasteries founded by Edgar, Queen of St. Barbe, one of whom represented this division of the county in Cromwell's Parliament, came into the possession of Lord Palmerston's grandfather about the middle of the last century. Its boundary approaches close to the town of Romsey, on the Southampton road, the park, which is partly wooded and partly pasture, is watered by wood and water, having many stately trees grouped with ancient taste and judgment over the whole of the river, which is here beautifully limpid and clear, abounding with trout, forms a most agreeable object. The house itself, as shown in our Illustration, is of simple but elegant architecture, with an Ionic portico fronting the west. It is built of fine white brick, designed by "Capability Brown," who laid out the park and pleasure grounds. The interior is said to be a model of substantial comfort and good taste in its arrangements and furniture. We shall describe some of the rooms and give one or more Illustrations of Romsey and Broadlands in a future Number.

Here, at Broadlands, Oct. 20, 1784, the late Prime Minister, Henry John Temple, was born. He was the third son of Lord Viscount Palmerston, of the younger branch of the Temple lineage, descendant of a Crown Solicitor at Dublin, whose eldest son, Attorney-General had been rewarded with an Irish peerage. The mother of our Lord Palmerston, Lady Mary Temple, was Miss Mary Mee, daughter of Mr. Benjamin Mee, who is believed to have been a respectable Dublin tradesman. The date of her marriage was 1783, the first wife, a daughter of Sir Francis Poole, of Cheshire, having died without children in 1763, a year or two after her marriage. Since we have mentioned Lady Mary Mee, who died at Broadlands, in the Red Walls, Bristol, it may be worth while to cite her epitaph in Romsey church, written by her husband, the father of our Lord Palmerston :—

> Whoe'er, like me, with trembling anguish brings
> His heart's whole treasure to fair Beauty's sprtign;
> Whoe'er, like me, to soothe distress and pain,
> Shall court the Muse, and ransack all her stores,
> Condemned, like me, to hear the fatal reply—
> To mark the fading cheek, the sinking eye;
> From the cold urne to wipe the damp of death,
> And watch, by watching, how to catch the breath;
> If chance should bring him to this artless line,
> Let him remember, and lament like mine.
> And to earth resigns her lovely charge,
> Whose virtue warmed me, and whose beauty blessed;
> Whose loss is paid by my life, by pride,
> Her duty friendship, and her friendship love.
> But yet remembering, that the parting sigh
> Appeals to Him who can alone relieve,
> The starting tear I checked—I kiss the rod,
> And wait the sentence of my God.

The author of these lines, which have been much admired, was never a public character, but was a Captain in the navy, and held office as a Lord of the Admiralty for a short time. He died in 1802, when his eldest son, the late Lord Palmerston, was a student at Cambridge, but eighteen years old; and the mother, she who had been simply "Mary Mee," survived many years.

Cambridge House, or rather, as Lord Palmerston, in dating his letters, preferred to style his residence, 94, Piccadilly, is well known to everybody who has seen London. It was occupied by the late Duke of Cambridge, who died there in 1850, and Lord Palmerston has lived there ever since. Here were the Saturday evening receptions, at which Lord and Lady Palmerston, with that winning courtesy and hospitality which they made an instrument of political and social power, so frequently entertained a large number of the members of both Houses of Parliament and other persons of influence or position.

The last of our three Illustrations represents the house where Lord Palmerston died, on Wednesday week. Brocket Hall, three miles northwest of Hatfield, Hertfordshire, was built about the middle of the last century for Sir Matthew Lamb, father of the first Viscount Melbourne, and grandfather of Lady Palmerston and of the late Lord Melbourne. It occupies the site of an old manor-house, formerly belonging to the family of the Brockets, from whom the place takes its name, but which had passed by marriage to the Heads, of Berkshire, and latterly was purchased by Sir Matthew Lamb. The park and grounds are spacious and very pleasant—one of their best features being supplied by a spacious sheet of water, an artificial expansion of the River Lea, which is crossed by a handsome bridge. The mansion, of which Mr. James Paine was the architect, has a solid and dignified aspect, but its internal apartments, especially the great ballroom, are finely proportioned and decorated with great splendour. The gallery contains some very good portraits, one of which is a whole-length figure, by Sir Joshua Reynolds, of the Prince of Wales, afterwards George IV., taken when he was about nineteen years old, and was staying at Brocket Hall. Queen Victoria honoured the late Lord Melbourne with a visit at this delightful mansion in the early part of her reign, when he was at the head of the Whig Administration; and here Lord Melbourne breathed his last, in 1848, leaving the place, with his other estates at Melbourne, in Leicestershire, and elsewhere, to his sister, Lady Palmerston.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

(From our own Correspondent).

PARIS, Oct. 26, 1865.

THE Emperor has given the Parisians another proof of his pluck, and has, of course, added largely to his popularity thereby. He went, on Friday last, to the cholera hospitals of the Rue Dieu, where he remained for upwards of an hour, conversing freely with the attendant physicians and nurses, and holding a few words of consolation to the unfortunate sufferers. It is said that when he drove up to the hospital in his phaeton, accompanied by only a single aide-de-camp, the porter, to whom he was unknown, hesitated at admitting him. News of the Imperial visit having quickly spread, a large crowd assembled outside the building, and cheered the Emperor most lustily as he drove away. On Monday and Tuesday, following the example of her consort, visited in succession the hospitals Beaujon, La Riboisière, and St. Antoine; went through the whole of the cholera wards, lingered at the bedside of the dying, and cheered and consoled sufferer after another with kind words of comfort. She too, you can well imagine, was greeted with the loud cheers as her carriage drove away from hospital after hospital. Their Majesties' next step was to set on foot a subscription for the destitute families of those who have died from the disease. The Emperor gave 25,000f., the Empress 15,000f., and the young Prince Imperial 10,000f. from his private purse. Instead of the brothers Perelire, with a joint subscription of 20,000f., and it is expected that their example will be widely followed. Spite of the present excessive wet weather, the disease is said to be on the decline. Precautionary measures have been taken, however, to prevent the typhus of the capital having been supplied with famine belts; each man, too, has an extra allowance of three centimes a day, to provide himself with a cup of hot coffee before going out to labour in the morning. The upper classes generally are terribly frightened. Many who had returned to Paris for the season have again fled to Versailles, which place is now enjoyed an immunity from cholera, and is looked upon as a charmed spot. Nevertheless, it has to deplore a few cases among its fallen victims to the disease, which has added somewhat to the general alarm. Among these is Mr. Arnold, secretary to Mr. Cobden, Prefect of the Seine, and Mdme. Donzé, wife of the French Ambassador at Berlin.

The Court is still at St. Cloud, where it is likely to remain some little time longer, and where councils of Ministers constantly assemble, under the presidency of the Emperor. The Comte de Morny, the Empress's mother, is on a visit at the palace. The Papal Nuncio was received in private audience the other day. It is now quite certain that nothing will be allowed to interfere with the immediate evacuation of Rome by the Papal troops, and that by the time this letter is in type Viterbo will, I expect, be delivered up to the Pontifical forces.

The Paris newspapers have published for the most part lengthy articles on the death of Lord Palmerston, and, as a rule, the French press may be said to have done the deceased Minister full justice. There is a general feeling of regret prevailing that his able, but entente cordiale is more than a mere phrase. On the graves that the Emperor and Empress paid to the English Minister the news of the Premier's death reaching Paris the Emperor sent a telegram to Viscount de la Guerronnière, who conveyed to Lady Palmerston, and a day or two afterwards M. Drouyn de Lhuys placed on record in the name of the Emperor a letter to the English Minister to be followed by the Government of which he is so able a member.

The Princess de la Tour d'Auvergne has quitted Paris to resume his diplomatic functions at the Court of St. James's. Prince Napoleon and the Princess Clotilde are still at Arenenberg. It is now believed that they will not return to France till after the Imperial fêtes at Compiègne have ended in fêtes.

Contemporaneously with the appearance in Paris of Victor Hugo's new volume of "Les Misérables" comes the news from Brussels of the marriage of M. Charles Hugo, to Mdlle. Lehaene, M. Louis Blanc being one of the witnesses. A few days later afterwards comes the news again of the marriage in Brighton, of M. Louis Blanc.

The Prince de Montlaart, an old bridegroom of eighty, died here, the other day, during the night. He was a fine white-moustached ex-Austrian Ambassador, during a ball given in honour of the recent nuptials of the Emperor and Empress. Mdme. de Montlaart, then a young man, caught up the beautiful Duchess of Savoy-Carignan in his arms and carried her to a chair. At her husband's death the Duchess married him, it is said, out of gratitude. His second wife was the young Princess Lucien Murat, to whom he had also previously married three weeks when death overtook him.

The Paris public are in a state about the tour of the nave of Notre Dame without paying. Parisians were much in the habit of twitting us with our old practice of making St. Paul's and the Abbey paying institutions. Now, however, they have a new La Fare-nave—as it is proposed in the new churches, "which will be naturally filled with chief-deuvres, to pay at the door, or double pay to see doors."

Dumas's great men in their dressing-gowns were in the costume in which his countrymen fight them. He himself, as a matter of fact, served up slippers. The light pomatis are made up of gossip about "the great Dukes, Lagrange, Richelieu, Frioul, Fiveal, Feltre, and the rest. Their feasts at Bignon's, their sayings at Peters' tavern in the centre now named after Lafitte, their fallen; their mistresses to Baden, or Trouville, or Ritetat, are all food for the chroniqueurs. Their nurses as well as their pets are served up in the historical paragraphs. M. de Girardin having lost a daughter, his confrères describe the poor little creature, and we become familiar with her death-bed. This infidelity would be trying indeed to Englishmen; but I believe our neighbours love it. The actors are pleased as the spectators, or we should not be admitted to these exhibitions. Albert Vouletin, catering for the Parisian reader, has just served up "Blanc, Lepeau, Perrin, Regnier, Provost, Fival, Feydeau," and in one article matter that would have served a parsimonious chroniqueur for many weeks. Some of it has appeared before in old. We know about Haydn dressing in his best to compose; and Mozart's manner of working in familiar enough. But here are a few touches that will be new to many English readers. M. Vizentini is my authority. Meyerbeer composes every morning, in his dressing-gown, surrounded by Arabian music-stands, with a tin saucepan before each. Auber composes on horseback, or riding in a carriage. Clapisson composes over his dinner. Adolphe Adam composed upon his Lorely XIII. and is preparing his pendant to "Psyche." Gounod, in his "artistic cosin" of the Rue de la Rochefoucauld, writes the musical dialogues of "Romeo and Juliet." Offenbach whistles, here and there, the lively airs that are to be in every body's mouth next winter. And Hector Devrik, and his birds, his friends, and his flowers, meditates a companion work to "Jules Rookh !"

SPAIN.

The Queen has made a donation of 1,000,000 reals to meet the expenses of tending persons attacked with cholera. The epidemic is spreading in the southern quarters of Madrid.

ITALY.

The King returned to Florence yesterday week. On Sunday he received in private audience the Mexican Envoy, and also the new Minister from the Grand Duke of Baden.

Just Princess Napoleon and Princess Clotilde arrived at Turin on Wed-nerday morning, and the King and Queen of Portugal arrived there in the evening. Their Majesties were received with enthusiasm.

The election of representatives to the Chamber of Deputies is proceeding. Garibaldi declined the nomination to Parliament offered to him by Turin, and recommended Signor Bottero to the electors.

A communication from Florence says :—"The halls of meeting for the two Chambers are completely restored. The Royal sitting will be held in the Palazzo Vecchio, the hall of the Senate not being so large as that of the Five Hundred. The preference has been given to the latter in consequence of its size, and from the glorious recollections which belong to it. Near the throne will be placed chairs for the King and Queen of Portugal, Princess Clotilde, Prince Napoleon, and Prince Humbert, who will stay at Florence for a few days while on his way from Milan to Naples, where he is to hold his court this winter.

The anniversary of the plebiscite by which the kingdom of Naples voted for annexation to Italy was celebrated on Sunday last. Many houses were decorated with flags, and in the evening the town was illuminated.

A telegram from Rome states that M. de Mérode, the Pope's Minister of War, has not resigned, but has merely been allowed leave of absence for three months.

SWITZERLAND.

The National Council assembled at Berne on Monday and began its deliberations upon the revision of the Federal Constitution.

The Council of States has entered upon the discussion of the Budget for 1866.

GERMANY.

Austria and Prussia have both made diplomatic complaint at Frankfort of that "free town" being made the place of assembly for the delegates whose ambition is to form a great German Parliament. The tone of Count Bismarck's note is most overbearing. It distinctly intimates that, if the Frankfort Diet and the Federal Union are not compliied with, the two great Powers will intervene, "in order to prevent the further consequences of a movement which has already been carried too far." The Senate, to whom the remonstrance was addressed, show symptoms of warm indignation.

AUSTRIA.

It is stated from Vienna that it has been resolved to concede to Hungary a separate Ministry. The Hungarian Government is capable of arriving at an understanding with Hungary on the broadest possible basis. The Emperor is favourable to the project of a real dissociation, to a certain extent, of the administration of Hungary from that of the other provinces of the empire would be carried out.

PRUSSIA AND THE PRUSSIAN DUCHIES.

Baron Zedlitz, the Prussian Civil Commissioner for the duchy of Schleswig, has issued a circular order that the public functionaries and officials of the duchy in reference to the demonstration made in honour of the Duke of Augustenburg on his passage through the town of Rendsburg. He orders that any person who is guilty of a repetition of such an event, to call out the military, in order to restrain those who pay little heed to any person, but to him himself. Much must be reserved for the Sovereign of the country, and also to process against those who might commit such demonstrations. Public officials are ordered to declare within three days whether or not they are prepared to carry out these instructions.

UNITED STATES.

A delegation from South Carolina has had an interview with President Johnson. Governor Magrath addressed them on behalf of Mr. Davis. Mr. Johnson replied that pardons must be proceeded with gradually, and in effect would be granted as fast as the treason had been committed it ought to be determined by the highest tribunal, even that of clemency should be unfortunate. There was neither malice nor prejudice in carrying out that duty, and no disposition existed for persecution or thirst for blood. Expressions of mutual confidence passed between the President and the delegation.

The President has pardoned the Confederate Vice-President Stephens and four leading Secessionists.

Mr. M'Culloch, the Secretary of the Treasury, had made a speech advocating a new circulating paper currency, declaring that if Congress would find the legal tender notes the return to a gold standard would quickly be effected without any commercial embarrassment.

Martial law has been withdrawn in Kentucky by order of the President.

General Grant has issued an order for the reorganisation of the army. A large number of troops in Mississippi are to be mustered out, and the whole of the coloured troops.

The North Carolina Convention has passed an ordinance abolishing slavery, and the 5th of November has been fixed for the election of State and members of Congress.

The Republicans have been successful in the State elections in Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, and Iowa.

The Fenian Council, after a week's session, issued a circular calling a congress of the whole order to assemble at Philadelphia on the 15th.

San Francisco was visited by an earthquake on the 8th, which shook the whole city, demolished some buildings, and left marks, in cracked walls and broken ceilings, on all the structures in the city.

INDIA.

Colonel Campbell has been removed from the service for mismanagement of the defence of Kelat-i-Ghilzai. Major Lumsden has been allowed a major's pension.

Armedeen, an extensive rebel of 1857, has been found guilty at Cawnpore, and sentenced to imprisonment for life.

The cattle disease is reported to have broken out in the Neilgherries. A conflict has occurred between the Rajah of Coorg and the Rajah of Burgerine is officially reported by the mandarins to have been drowned along with all his followers.

Advices from Japan state that all was quiet at the different ports.

ITALY.

The colossal equestrian statue of Prince Eugène was unveiled at Vienna on the 18th. It is two and a half times the size of life, and is by the well-known sculptor Fremiet.

Blondin has been performing in Berlin, where, for the first time in his life, he has had to pay for the use of the ground on which he and the time, and escaped with a contusion which was not severe enough to prevent his going on with the performance at the appointed hour.

An American journal states that a Swiss invention has been introduced to aid in the formation of rain clouds. Powerful masses of ozone are imprinted by machinery so as exactly to represent the dividing wall of each between the cells. These strips are allowed to dry for a few minutes before the new steam is put in, thus enabling the bee to go immediately to work, and also "guiding them in the direction they should take to their hives."

Lord Malmesbury sends a letter to La France claiming for himself, and not for Lord Palmerston, the merit of having been foremost to recognise the establishment of the empire in 1852, and of having received the news of the Foreign Office on the 2nd of December. The Whigs only came into power two weeks after that event; and, if Lord Palmerston had known they would have taken the same cordial course of concurrence in the new empire which ensued.

The last public act in relation to the recent Tir National, at Brussels, was performed on Sunday, on which day the Count of Flanders distributed the prizes to the successful competitors. The distribution took place in the Temple des Augustins, a building which, having formerly been a church, is now used for public ceremonies. The proceedings occupied about three hours. The prizes, which were of plate, clocks, &c., were given away. The prizes won by English volunteers were as follow:—Lieutenant Martineau, six coverts, prize of the Government, for a double-barrel gun; Sergeant —, and a purse of 5*l.* for a good bull's-eye at the Chêne à volants. Captain Millican, 6th Leicester, and Lieutenant Remington, 5th Cumberland, each four coverts, a Government prize, for a good bull's-eye at the Chêne à volants. It will thus be seen that our men have only carried away prizes for good bull's-eye, and not for pocket.

The contest took place, on Wednesday week, at the Windsor butts, between eleven selected from one company of the Windsor volunteers and eleven selected from two companies of the Richmond and Metcalfe volunteers. After some excitement being felt by both parties, the Windsor men were victorious by 5 points.

A friendly contest has taken place between non-commissioned officers and volunteers of the 1st and 2nd rifle volunteer corps. Twenty-five on each side met at the Government rifle range, Pirbright Common, and fired four rounds each at 200 yards. The result, after total score being 1114, while the volunteers scored but 981 points. The commissioned officers engaged have been the adjutant, Captain Hall, and Major Marines and the three depot battalions stationed there. The volunteer party consisted of officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates of the 9th, 10th, and 40th Kent Rifles.

A match between the Wootton Bassett and Highworth rifle corps—ten men from each company—took place recently, on the range of the latter, and resulted in the Wootton Bassett men beating their antagonists by one point. This was a return match, the Highworth men having beaten their opponents upon their range by thirteen points.

We abridge from the Manchester Guardian an account of the doings of some of the Lancashire corps :—The 4th Administrative Brigade of Lancashire Artillery Volunteers was inspected, at Preston, last Saturday. The members paraded at the depôt of the Preston corps, and afterwards proceeded to the Marsh, under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel Birchall, Colonel Cox was the inspecting officer. After a few evolutions had been gone through, the brigade returned to the depôt, where they went through gun practice. The artillerymen were complimented on their efficiency by the inspecting officer.——The fifth annual rifle competition of the Blackburn corps took place, on Friday and Saturday last, at the Audley range, which prizes in silver cups and money, to the value of £100, were shot for. The company's prizes were first competed for, and the following is the list of the principal winners :—Company's prizes—Colour-Sergeant Pickering, Sergeant Milner, Private Hodgson. No. 2 company : Private Chadborn, Corporal Wignall, Private Cranshaw. No. 3 company : Colour-Sergeant Pickering, Sergeant Milner, Private Hodgson. No. 4 company : Colour-Sergeant Pickering, Corporal Elliott, Private Mercer. No. 5 company : Colour-Sergeant Pickering, Corporal Elliott, Private Chadborn. Lieutenant-Colonel Feilden, a silver cup, value £20, and £12 10*s.* in money, were then shot for, and won by Sergeant-Major Pickering, with 74 points. This is the second time this year that Mr. Feilden has carried off the medal presented by the Colonel to the best shot of the battalion. The fifth battalion, as a company, took the Martini-Henry, and the Martini-Henry will be competed for by the efficient members, on their own ground, at Leigh. The Accrington corps, under Captain Hindle, have been practising with the Martini-Henry rifle. First Lancashire Rifle Volunteers, third, Sergeant Barnett, Worsley ; fourth, Private Ashcroft, Atherton ; fifth, Corporal Bradley, Bolton ; sixth, Private Ashcroft, Atherton ; fifth, Corporal Bradley, Bolton ; sixth, Private Ashcroft, Atherton. The members of the corps competed for the 1st Manchester assembled on the range, last Saturday, to compete for the fourth time for the prizes presented by their captain. The cup and money prize were won by Private Goodier, Private Fawkes won the second, and Private Hall the third. Lieutenant-Colonel Heywood's challenge prize competed for, last Saturday, on the ground of the 3rd Lancashire, at Heaton Park, was won by Sergeant Hall, and Private Hall, of the second by Sergeant W. Newton. The third, fourth, and fifth prizes were won respectively by Sergeant Hall, Private Hall, and Private H. Hall, and Private Ashworth by the same corps. The company ascendant on the range of the regiment, at Astley, to compete for the challenge cup and money prizes, was won by Captain Hall's company, Private Wilson was the prize. Lance-Corporal M'Intyre, Sergeant M'Kellar, Private Wilson, and Private Hall, of the latter company, also having to share between the winning previously.——Last Saturday a rifle-match took place at Meltham. The match was shot at 200 yards, and resulted in a win for the Meltham match. Last year, No. 9 company, after a close contest, won the match ; but this year they had to contend with two strong opponents, who have since forty marks.——The members of No. 8 company also competed for their challenge prize, which was presented by Captain Hall. The second prize was won by Lance-Corporal Dixon, after a tie with Sergeant Green, who had to submit to the decision of the umpire. Private Lees took the third prize, Ensign Wm. Brigg the fourth, and Private Hall, late member of No. 9 company, met a like number of men belonging to the Holmfirth corps, and had to submit to defeat by seven points.——The annual distribution of prizes to the successful competitors in the shooting of the Bradford Rifle Volunteers took place in the new volunteer barracks at Bradford. The value of prizes awarded amounted to £150. Out of a force of 686 there are sixty marksmen and 120 first-class shots. The prizes for the Provincial Meeting at Bisley, in June next, will be of greater value than at present year. The Mayor (Mr. C. Semon) distributed some of the principal prizes, and congratulated the corps upon the efficiency of its members.

The Galloway Administrative Battalion of Rifles was inspected on Newton Stewart. Out of an enrolled strength of 402 men, 402 were present. The inspecting officer, Colonel Reed, expressed himself highly satisfied with all respects in a far more satisfactory condition than he had found it in previous inspections.

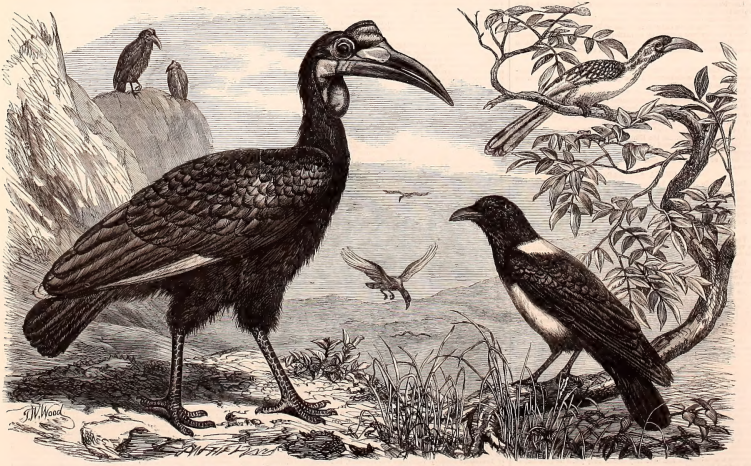
The report of the Children's Employment Commissioners, as to the way in which very young children were employed in some of the Sheffield trades, has been taken up by the Town Council with a view to further inquiry. At the meeting of that body last week it was agreed to appoint a committee to take into consideration the report of the Children's Employment Commission, so far as it related to that town, and to report thereon to the council. A considerable variety of opinion was expressed—the general opinion being, however, in favour of inspection, if proved to be necessary. The Factory Acts appeared unsatisfactorily explained away the statements of the Commissioners.

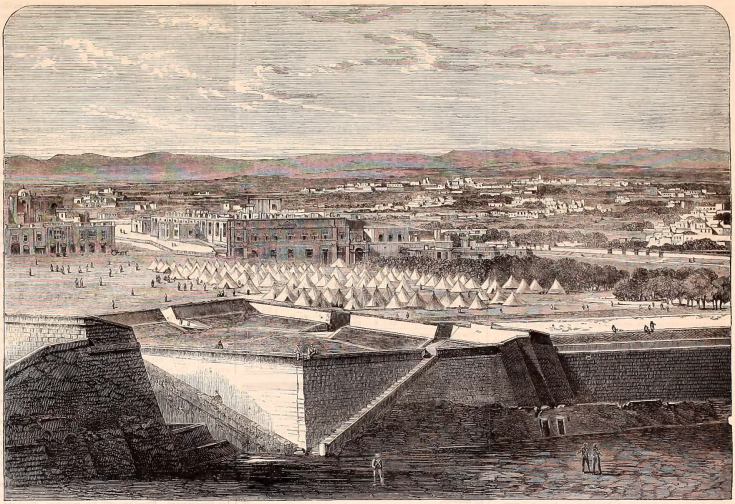
LATTICE-GIRDER BRIDGE OVER THE RIVER WYE.

NEW BRIDGES OVER THE WYE.



Two new bridges over the Wye have been erected by the Hereford, Hay, and Brecon Railway Company. The one shown in our Illustration is not a railway bridge, but has been provided to replace the old bridge connected with the high road, near the Welsh border town of Hay, where the River Wye forms the boundary between Brecknockshire and Radnorshire. Here for the last hundred years existed a wooden bridge, whose somewhat crazy structure was patched and renewed more than once when torn away by the heavy floods to which the river is periodically subject. The control and management of the bridge was vested in commissioners, who have the right to levy toll on the public. As some arrangement was necessary to enable the railway to cross the approaches to the old road bridge, which was now becoming radically unsafe, Mr. Savin, who is so well known in connection with the Welsh system of railways, of which he has been a principal promoter, agreed to build a new iron bridge on a lease of the tolls for 100 years being granted to him. The erection was intrusted to Messrs. Handyside and Co., engineers, of Derby and London, while Mr. W. G. Hughes, C.E., supplied the design. This bridge has an imposing and lofty elevation. It is 380 ft. long, and the rail-level is 50 ft. above the surface of the water. There are four river-spans of 72 ft. and two shore-spans of 20 ft., and the breadth of roadway is 22 ft. The wrought-iron columns are attached to a heavy iron caisson, resting on the river bed, which is here so hard and rocky as to obviate the necessity of screw-piles, if it were possible to use them. On the caissons are placed the main lattice girders, on the bottom of which is the roadway, constructed of iron, corrugated in a peculiar manner patented by Mr. Hughes, and trussed with strong iron rods. The rocks seen in the Engraving are the ruins of the foundations of the old structure.

The other bridge we have mentioned is at Whitney, in Herefordshire, four miles lower down the river. The railway here crosses the river, the banks of which have not here the steepness and height which are characteristic of its course further on; but the woods and meadow-land have a picturesque beauty of their own, and the tourist who only knows the river at Chepstow and Ross will be delighted if, coming up beyond Hereford, he sees the same stream as it flows out of Wales into England; and if his taste is for salmon-fishing, it can here be amply gratified. From Hereford the new railway runs some seventeen miles to the place where, at the little village of Whitney, it crosses the river, here of considerable width. This bridge, by the same engineers, is formed of lattice-girders, which are every day being more used for such purposes, and which in this case are 8 ft. deep. These are supported by wrought-iron columns, the lower ends of which form piles screwed into the bed of the river to a depth of from 12 ft. to 20 ft., and strongly framed together to ensure perfect rigidity and firmness. There are three main spans of 80 ft. and two shore spans of 44 ft. each, these latter resting on stone piers. The flooring of the bridge is formed of timber, on which the permanent way is laid with considerable depth of ballast. As a test, a train of locomotives was placed upon the bridge for some time; and this, as well as a heavy running load, was safely borne without any permanent deflection. The bridges were erected under the immediate superintendence of Mr. J. Smith, resident engineer for Messrs. Handyside and Co.



NEW BIRDS LATELY ADDED TO THE ZOOLOGICAL SOCIETY'S COLLECTION.

Among the most recent novelties added to the Zoological Society's collection in the Regent's Park are three specimens of African birds, of which figures are given in the accompanying Illustration. The large, gaunt-looking bird, which occupies the foreground, and companions of which are seen in various positions on the rocks behind and in the air above, is one of the strange family of hornbills—the Buceerotidæ of naturalists. Departing widely from the usual habits of his congeners, which are generally forest-lovers and fruit-eaters, the ground hornbill, as its name indicates, inhabits the open districts of inner Africa, and lives upon insects and reptiles. The Abyssinian traveller Bruce, who speaks of this bird as the "Erkoon," or "Abba Gunda" of that country, says that it walks and runs with great velocity, and is generally unwilling to fly, but "when disturbed flies both strong and far." The example in the Zoological Society's possession may be generally seen either stalking about on the floor or perched upon the summit of a tree in the roomy aviary in which he is kept. It is very interesting to see him attack a live snake, which is sometimes given to him. Hopping adroitly round his victim, he watches his opportunity until he secures a pick at its head with his pointed bill. This disables the snake, which, after some preliminary beating about to render it more palatable, is then swallowed whole, and apparently much relished.

The figure on the tree in the right-hand corner of our Engraving is that of a small and very elegant member of the same group of birds—the red-billed hornbill (Toccus erythrorhynchus). This is a native of Western Africa, where it resorts to the forests, and lives probably altogether on fruit. Besides these two birds, the Zoological Society's aviaries now contain fine living specimens of three other species of the same family, amongst which are examples of the large concave-casqued hornbill and rhinoceros hornbill, remarkable for the extraordinary forms of their beaks.

The white-aspect crow (Corvus albicollis), which is shown perched on the trunk of the tree in our Illustration, is an African member of that well-known group of birds, and, as regards habits and manners, does not exhibit any noteworthy differences from those of the common crow of the country. It is, however, a scarce bird in captivity; the present specimen, which arrived from Kordofan along with the young female African elephant recently added to the society's menagerie, being believed to be the first example of this bird ever brought alive to this country.

SANITARY ENCAMPMENT OF THE TROOPS AT MALTA.

In the Number of our Journal for the 23rd of September we gave an Illustration of the encampment of the 100th (Prince of Wales's Royal Canadian) Regiment on the glacis of Fort Mascol, at Malta, that regiment having, by command of his Excellency the Governor, Sir Henry Storks, been removed from barracks and placed under canvas to benefit the health of the men and to prevent their being attacked by the cholera, which has lately visited both the Maltese population and the British troops in that island. We now present a similar Illustration from a photograph sent us by Captain C. Breton, of the encampment of the 47th (King's Own) Regiment in the Floriana Parade-ground, near their own barracks. The tents under the trees have a melancholy interest from the fact that members of this gallant regiment died in them while the cholera was raging in the island.

PARIS FASHIONS FOR NOVEMBER.—SEE NEXT PAGE.

PARIS FASHIONS FOR NOVEMBER.

On the costumes represented in the Engraving seen in a morning dress in violet silk, a colour quite a la mode now, and lately worn by her Majesty the Empress; its shape, the "Gabrielle," is to the last degree becoming; the trimmings at the back of the neck and on the shoulders are in insertion of crisp with bogies; the shoulder-knots and tables being of the same material, with pendent buttons. The lines of jet thus introduced display to advantage the elegant simplicity of this costume. At the bottom of the skirt one row of the same trimming is mostly preferred, which is similarly carried along the seam of the sleeve. In front, large buttons, also of the same jet, form in gimp insertion, reach to the bottom of the dress.

In the second figure will be found a "Toilette de Visite," in worsted-cassa, with jacket and skirt of the same shade. It will be observed, however, that the pattern of the jacket is novel, the edges being bordered with lace; if below that a trimming of Maltese lace is added, a very pretty effect is produced. The jacket is trimmed like the skirt.

The bonnet is very elegant. The front and inside being in black velvet, considerable brilliancy is given to the gold ornament of the dark ground. The aigrette is black, and, with a spotted lace veil, completes agreeably this article of costume. The cape is also trimmed over the forehead, has a most coquettish air.

The third toilet approximates in some degree. The form of the cloak in black velvet, with pascementerie of the same colour, is very graceful, the lower border being trimmed in lace. The colour of the dress is "havanne;" the ribbons being in white taffeta, covered with black pulpure insertion. The lappels upon the flounce, as well as the circular trimming shown at the beginning, are of the same material, and set off admirably this very distinguished toilet. The bonnet is in black velvet, in the style known as the "Empire," trimmed with white feathers. Bonnets generally remain very small, and the "fanchons" pattern is especially worn in concert and theatre in preference à la visière.

In jewellery cameos will be especial favourites, and complete "parures" are already exhibited by the leading houses. These gems invariably command the admiration of all persons of taste. The settings must, however, be simple and chaste, to coincide with the prevailing goût.

Russian bodkins, ornamented with little chains, will be much worn over dark dresses of every shade.

Dresses without plaits but with gored skirts are quite in vogue, whilst pascementerie, with white bugles or jet, is much used in trimming. Walking dresses are, of course, short, and Parisian elegants trimmed to correspond with the dress itself, the colours alone contrasting.

In "coiffures" the back hair is not being worn so low as it has recently been; cornets and curls are being arranged in a coquettish style suiting so many different classes of features.

"Pardessus" are demi-saison, and are ready to define but not fit the figure. They are ornamented with "capuchons." The materials used are of considerable substance, and those specified patterns now made in every variety of colour are much in request.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON: SATURDAY, OCTOBER 28, 1865.

EXCEPT that President Johnson is an honest and earnest man, the readers of old English fiction might be reminded by him of the Justice before whom Roderick Random and his friends were taken, and who opened upon them with a tremendous volley of indignation, recognising them as old and hardened offenders, and menacing them with the most dreadful punishment. But, after being "spoken to" in the next room, the magistrate returned with a smiling and benevolent face, announced that they were free, and explained that he had not been really angry, but that it was always his way to terrify young people when brought before him, in order to produce an enduring fear of offending the law. When Mr. Johnson became President, he was described to us as a stern and gloomy dictator, who had come to execute vengeance upon the murderers of his predecessor and upon the rebels who approved the deed; besides that, he was about to make his iron hand felt to the remotest corner of the territory that had been subdued by the Union. We can know only what we are told, and we waited in anxiety and with sorrow to hear that the hangmen were stalking over the land, and that the afterharvest of death was being reaped. Mail after mail brought us no such intelligence. A small group of notoriously guilty persons perished; but since that time we have heard of nothing but conciliation and pardon. Not a political execution has taken place; and, the very chiefs of the insurrection having been forgiven, the President is last seen receiving a deputation that begs the life of the ex-President, and Mr. Johnson, in a tone of grave good-nature, intimates that there is no desire to be revengeful, but that really Mrs. Varina Davis does not write the sort of letter that might be expected from a lady who wished to deliver her husband from danger. It is the case of Smollett's magistrate again, with the slight difference that the London justice was a corrupt old fellow, and the American President is an upright and right-hearted gentleman.

Mr. Johnson's difficulties, which are greater now than they have ever been, seem likely to be aggravated by his clemency. Neither friends nor foes appear to be behaving with fitting consideration for the occasion. Of the foes indeed say nothing. The rankling sensation of defeat, and, more excusably, the painful change of social position, have made the name of the President odious to thousands of Confederates. Large numbers have been wise, and are making the best of things, but many are indulging in the smallest revenges: negroes are persecuted, Northern officials snubbed, and, in certain cases, driven away, and the suffrages which have been restored to the insurgents are avowedly used in making demonstrations of detestation of the Union. All this is unfortunate, but could not be unexpected. If the President tightens the reins, the negroes use the whip, if he does not he has made such measures necessary. But his friends, or rather those who represent feelings which he was erroneously supposed to represent, are causing much anxiety to him and his Government. They are still for extremes. They are not satisfied that slavery no longer exists in the Union, but they insist on elevating the negro to the dignity of the law-maker, and they declare that his freedom has not been accomplished while Southern negroes are existing up to the knees in the ground with facetious pomposity his vote for Massa Negrophile.

The absurdity of such a demand cannot escape the American mind. An American seldom laughs, but he has a keen sense of humour; and the idea of delegating sovereignty to Quashee and Gumbo is too good to be thrown aside. But it would be too strong a measure for the wildest Abolitionist to recommend the extension of the franchise to the black individual on the ground of his intelligence to govern for it. That would be fatally ludicrous. But the advocates of the black franchise, after premising, and with truth, that most of the negroes are as fit to vote as most of the Irish who have obtained the privileges of citizenship, have the choice of another and more plausible plea. Mr. Mill has helped them to this, and we much regret that he has done so, because he has supplied arguments to those who cannot see the whole case, but are rejoiced to use all the distinguished name that is at the disposal of their fanaticism. It is contended that it is necessary to give the negro his vote, in order to counterbalance the assured enmity of the South towards the Union, freedom, and North principles.

This seems to us to be a very clumsy method of meeting a difficulty. If there were no other objection to it, there would be the great one that it diminishes the chance, or the hope, that one day the conditions of the suffrage in America may be modified. We do not speak from an English platform. There is not an educated American who, when at liberty to speak his mind, does not declare universal suffrage to be the cause why the best class of men eschew politics. Those who should lead and advise their fellows abstain from that duty, because with political power equally bestowed upon all, it is the noisy demagogue who gets to the front instead of the thoughtful statesman. Could the minds of the educated class in America be taken at this moment, it would be for abolishing universal suffrage, while admitting to the poll a larger class than is enfranchised in England. Without denying the abstract right of equality, the American insists to the fact that, with few exceptions, the politicians of his country are unworthy of her; and the press, which must be a gauge of general intellect and principle, is utterly unworthy, not only of a great country, but of the lowest level of civilisation. With such conviction, in the minds of thoughtful Americans, it is sought to increase the mass of ignorant and irresponsible power by adding to the loafer, the rowdy, the exiled German, and the degraded Irishman, the irresponsible negro as a constituent of the Government.

But an appeal on these considerations would be hopeless. It could be made only through the American press, and, as it would be in the highest degree unpopular, it is not to be supposed that the lowest press in the world would dare to run counter to the feeling of a public, which, if ignorant, is large, and has money. The only thing which the Americans ought to bear in mind is, that whereas they have been unkindly and unjustly laughed at for many things, some of which were natural in a new country, and some of which were not ludicrous at all, they will be the legitimate laughing-stock of the world the moment that Quashee becomes a political power. If the Lanjo is to be introduced into the Constitution of the United States, there is an end of gravity. If we are to have State papers dictated by gentlemen who talk the language of Aunt Dinah, diplomacy will lose its owl-like character, whatever it may gain in exchange. The subject is full of tempting suggestions; but we treat it in no spirit of ill-nature, but because there is really danger lest fanaticism and party hate should impel a Congress, elected amid excitement, to do that which will bring the "Anglo-Saxon" name into contempt for all time. We hope for better things. "No, Mr. Vernon, this is not the Barthelmew Fair," says Major Pendennis, when his nephew is in love with the actress. Surely Columbia will have sense to say that she will not marry Gumbo at the altar of the Constitution.

EARL RUSSELL'S ARRANGEMENTS.—The Queen, in exercise of her prerogative, has been pleased to signify to Earl Russell her wish that he should carry on the Government as Prime Lord of the Treasury. In proceeding to execute the Queen's commands, Earl Russell has received cordial assurances of support and confidence from all his colleagues. A meeting of the Cabinet was appointed to take place on Thursday, but is postponed to Saturday, in consequence of the attention of the arrangements connected with the obsequies of Lord Palmerston. Until then we cannot specify what changes which must follow the death of the late chief of the Administration; but we believe we are not wrong in anticipating that the country will have the advantage of the ability and experience of Lord Clarendon as Secretary of Foreign Affairs.—Globe.

CHURCH AND UNIVERSITIES.

Yesterday week the Bishop of Manchester consecrated Caton Church, Brookhouse, near Lancaster.

On Thursday week the first new old Norman church of St. Cross Hospital, Winchester, was opened after restoration.

A statue of Sir Isaac Newton, in the robes of the Order of the Bath, designed by Mr. Theed, R.A., and executed by Mr. Hunt, has been placed in the parish church of St. Mary, Grantham.

Alderman Phillips, the Lord Mayor elect, has nominated as his chaplain for the year of his mayoralty the Rev. Richard Glyn, M.A., Rector of Allhallows, Lombard-street, and Minor Canon of St. Paul's.

A new ecclesiastical district has been formed out of the parish of Lanteglos-by-Camelford, Cornwall, and named Advent, and dedicated to St. John the Baptist.

Mr. James Anderson, one of the oldest parishioners of Selby, a local magistrate, and a deputy lieutenant of the West Riding, has offered to build a new church in that town, provided the site be presented. The movement is on foot, at Selby, for the restoration of the Abbey Church, at an estimated cost of £40,000 or £50,000.

On Monday the Bishop of Winchester consecrated the new church of St. Andrew, Wells-road, Bath. The church is in the early Gothic style, capable of containing 800 persons, and has been erected at a cost of about £5,000. The site was given by Mr. Gibbs, and the Rev. J. Camden congratulation.

The new Church of All Saints, Pidley-cum-Fenton—the living of which is held by the Dean of Lincoln—was opened for Divine worship on the 18th inst. The sermon was preached by the rector, the principal subscriber being the Rev. Dr. Jermin, who bestowed the site and £1,000 in the erection. The cost of the building was £2,000.

The ancient Church of St. Augustine, Northbourne, near Deal, Kent, has lately been greatly added to and embellished by a very beautiful stained window, the gift of Mrs. Cresswell, of Ripple, in that parish; also by two richly-stained windows, at the east end; the whole being from the designs of Mr. Gambier Parry, of Highnam Court, Gloucester, and, in the case of the latter, executed by Mr. Wailes, of Newcastle.

Mr. Beresford Hope, M.P., on Tuesday addressed a large meeting, at Leeds, on church extension. In the course of an address which was very well received, Mr. Hope said that he was not for building a cheap church, with a number of chapels of ease in connection, all worked from the mother church. He was for a church with a vicar and curate, and sufficient new experience in working Ecclesiastical Districts.

The Rev. Dr. Jermin, the foundation-stone of which was laid by the Earl of Powis, was consecrated, on Tuesday week, by the Bishop of St. Asaph, in the parish church of Welshpool, in which town it were present. Forwarded among the subscribers to this good work are—Archdeacon Pryce, £100; Mr. Pryce Jones, £100; Mr. Pryce Pryce Jones, £100; Lord de Tabley, £100; Mr. R. R. Jones, £100; Captain M. Jones, £100; the Lord Bishop of St. Asaph, £50.

The ladies of Limehouse parish have presented the Rev. Edward Day, who has been for twenty-one years their vicar, a purse with a silver inkstand, library clock, and an address on vellum, as a token of their appreciation of his services during that period. The address is signed by the ladies of the district, and by the churchwardens, sidesmen, and district as an offering from the poor; and a pocket communion service is given by the district visitors, the Finsbury-square Congregational Association, of which the rev. gentleman is Chaplain, were also presented to him.

The sermon in aid of the Church Missionary Society was given to the erection of two new colonial bishoprics—one for Dunedin, New Zealand; and one for New Westminster, in contemplation—and to the bishops of the Canadian Colonies. The Rev. Henry Lascelles Jenner, LL.B., of Trinity Hall, Cambridge, and Vicar of Fordham, Cambridgeshire, has been duly nominated to the bishopric of Dunedin. It will include the provinces of Otago and Southland, in the southern island of New Zealand. The Rev. Postlethwaite, M.A., of Trinity College, Cambridge, incumbent of Coatham, near Redcar, has been appointed.

The following preferments and appointments have recently been announced:—The Rev. C. Bullock, Rector of Ashwell, Herts, to Hardwicke; Rev. J. R. Hall, Rector of Coolaclon, and Rossinlea Rectory, Diocese of Cork, to Castle Island, Diocese of Ardfert; Rev. J. Hill, to East Knoyle; Rev. C. B. Bishop, jun., to Spurstrape; Rev. J. B. Ker, F. Worsnop to Eastham; Rev. J. G. Wilkinson to Sandhurst-cum-Ellenhall.

LORD PALMERSTON'S FUNERAL.

OUR COUNTRY EDITION is put to press too early to contain more than the arrangements made for the funeral of Lord Palmerston, in Westminster Abbey. In a later Edition, however, we shall give some particulars of the obsequies. Foremost among the points of interest connected therewith is the announcement that the Prince of Wales would be present to share in the last honours paid to Lord Palmerston—her Majesty having represented by Lord Bury, the Treasurer of the Household.

The following are the arrangements made. The hearse, on leaving Cambridge House, will be followed by ten mourning-coaches, the occupants of which will be as follow :—

First Carriage.—The Right Hon. Sir Cowper, the Rev. Henry Sotheau; Admiral Sir W. Bowles, K.C.B.; the Earl of Shaftesbury.

Second Carriage.—Major Ashley, Mr. Cowper, the Rev. G. Baker, Mr. Lawrence Sulivan, Mr. William Ashley, the Rev. Mr. Bridges.

Third Carriage.—The Right Hon. Spencer Cowper, Earl Cowper; the Hon. Henry Ashley, M.P., the Rev. Mr. Cowper, Mr. Ashley.

Fourth Carriage.—Lord Ashley, the Hon. Lionel Ashley, the Hon. Cecil Ashley, Mr. Ashley.

Fifth Carriage.—Viscount Sudeley, General Sir G. Bowles, Sir G. Bowles, Mr. Charles Barrington.

Sixth Carriage.—His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, Viscount Mary Fitzwilliam, Earl Spencer, the Lord Chamberlain, the Archbishop of Canterbury.

Seventh Carriage.—The Right Hon. the Speaker, the Lord Chancel or, Earl Russell, Earl Granville.

Eighth Carriage.—The Duke of Argyll, the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone, the Right Hon. Sir George Grey, the Right Hon. Charles Wood, M.P.

Ninth Carriage.—The Earl of Clarendon, Earl De Grey, the Duke of Somerset, Lord Stanley of Alderley.

Tenth Carriage.—The Right Hon. E. Cardwell, the Right Hon. C. P. Villiers, the Right Hon. Milner Gibson, the Hon. Henry Baring, M.P.

Behind these come the private carriages of the nobility and gentry who desire to pay a mark of respect to the late Premier. The first of these will, as a matter of course, be that of Lord Palmerston. Immediately following the hearse will be the state carriages of the Prince of Wales, the Duke of Cambridge, the Duchess of Cambridge, the Duchess of Inverness and others. Then come the carriages of the French Ambassador, the Spanish Ambassador, Bavarian, and other foreign Ministers. Behind the carriages of the foreign Ministers succeed those of the soldiers' Field Marshals, and friends of Lord Palmerston, to the number of upwards of 300.

Deputations of municipal bodies in various parts of the kingdom will also be in the procession, including the Lord Mayor of London and the civic authorities of Westminster, Liverpool, Manchester, and Cambridge.

It is with pleasure we also learn that the Bonney tenantry will follow the procession on foot as it passes from Cambridge House, along Piccadilly, down St. James's-street, along Pall-mall, by Charing-cross, down Whitehall, and by the western entrance of the Abbey, which it is expected to reach at one o'clock.

A force of soldiers will line the way and keep order, and mounted men of the same force will keep the road clear in front of the procession.

On arriving at the Abbey the various municipal deputations and a body of the Bonney volunteers will be escorted into the sanctuary, and the body and the mourners will enter the Abbey by the great west door, and will proceed to the choir, where the body will rest in front of the sacrarium.

The pallbearers will be ten Cabinet Ministers—namely, the Lord Chancellor, Earl Russell, Earl Granville, the Duke of Argyll, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir George Grey, Sir Charles Wood, the Earl of Clarendon, Earl De Grey, and the Duke of Somerset.

A site on the western side of the north transept has been selected for the grave of Lord Palmerston. Close to the spot are the graves of the two Pitts, Fox, the two Cannings, and other statesmen of eminence.

All the State documents were conveyed from Brocket Hall and Cambridge House on Saturday week, by order of Mr. Hunt, at the Treasury's official residence, in Downing-street.

The Royal Society of New York, reports having passed, on the 10th of September, in lat. 65, long. 34.18, a red hazy marked Telegraph, No. 1, the Cyclops, which the brig was nearly passing. Cable of the Edwin believed the buoy was seen from the cable.

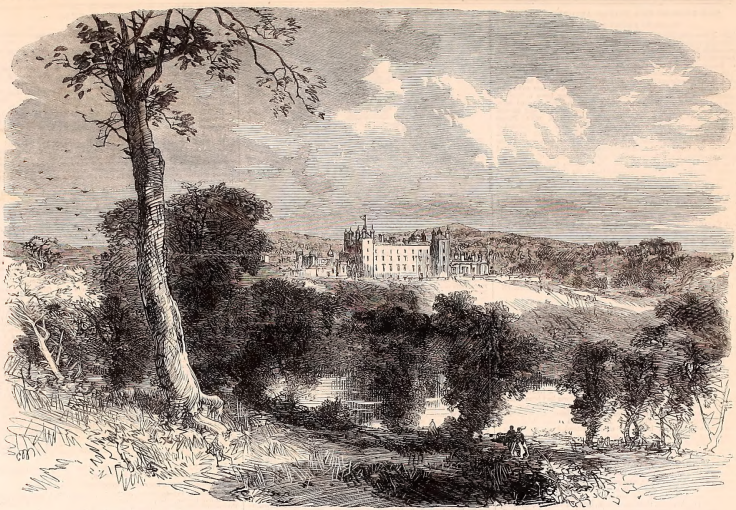
The Bishop of Oxford, Dr. Wilberforce, the capital of British Columbia, was destroyed by fire on the 8th of September last. The new town contains about 6,000 people, and the city of Victoria—Canada—the first and only port in the Pacific—was fortunately preserved.

At a meeting held in Dublin, a committee was appointed to take into the notice of the Government and the public, in any rearrangement of the educational system of Ireland, the claims of the Irish industrial schools to participate in the general educational education.

The balance in the hands of the local treasurer from the receipts at the Exhibition, amounting to £211, a portion of which is to be applied to charitable purposes. On Thursday week the Bishop of Norwich entertained the Mayor and Corporation at a public luncheon.

The autumnal session of the Congregational Union of England and Wales opened in Bristol, and was continued during the week. There was a large gathering of ministers and deacons connected with the various churches of the denomination in the city. The first meeting, which was of a devotional character, was held in Castle-green Chapel. On Monday evening, at the Broadmead Chapel, Mr. Alexander delivered an address. The first meeting of ministers and delegates was held on Monday, at the Broadmead Chapel, when the chairman, Mr. Thompson, M.P., delivered the usual address. Various papers were read during the week.

In the new number of the Proceedings of the British Meteorological Society is a letter from Mr. H. Bonford, by which we learn that, in consequence of the unusually dry weather experienced in the beginning of October, 1864, when between 80,000 and 100,000 persons perished, the Government of Bengal has established a system of meteorological observations, which will enable them to forecast future seasons, and to provide for them, and that it is hoped that the system will be extended to Madras. We may think it a matter of congratulation that one of the meteorologists of India and the Bay of Bengal. In a letter to Mr. Glaisher, Mr. C. D. Campbell, the meteorologist presiding at the Bombay Observatory, gives an account of the proceedings of the British Association, which was held at Aberdeen, in September, 1859. The average number of rainy days there in the year is 141 in Bombay, 107 in the month of June, 1865, 26 in July, and August bring 2, and in each of the other eight we months, 1½. The average fall in June is 13 inches, in August 12, in July 11, and in the rest of the year it has a great deal of water, so the thing required was a supply of that. The highest temperature in Bombay is 96deg Fahrenheit, 14deg higher than that of London, and 20deg higher. Other data are given.



DIAMOND CUT DIAMOND.—A curious case as to the ownership of a diamond was settled, yesterday week, in the Lord Mayor's Court. The plaintiff was Mr. Alfred Allan, of Bond-street, and the defendant, Mr. Phillips, of Hatton-garden. It appeared that a friend of the latter put in the hat of an ivory box. Some time after, George Phillips, candle-maker, St. Helens, had to clean out the box, and found a diamond of the value of £100. In the course of the examination the precious stone fell out of Phillips's hand, and, supposing it to be glass, threw it when the next day up the diamond was out of its place and, though the room was searched, could not be found. Shortly after the box was sold to Allan, who, on finding it, sold it. Allan and Mrs. Phillips went to jointing together, and the former discovered that the bottom of the box had been cut out and a piece of wood put in. The work of challenging began, and ultimately the Allans got the ring home with the diamond in it. Mrs. Phillips then went to Allan's shop, and, on seeing the ring, declared it to be hers. Allan refused to give it up, and Mrs. Phillips went out of the room for, and found the box in the window. She returned to the shop and declared that it was a perfect fit. The gentleman from whom they got the box was called. His position corroborated, and the jury declared it to be the identical diamond he gave them. Thus convinced, the Allans kept possession of the ring, and the jewellery was fined £20. Mr. Phillides, who thereupon raised an action to recover possession of the gem. On support of the application, Mr. Serjeant Simmons said that the Allans were of a diamond pin five years ago; that the stone was taken out of the pin and placed in a ring, and that the ring was sold to the plaintiff. Mrs. Phillips sold pin, and did not fit the hole on the lid of the box belonging to the ring. The stone having a chip in it, replaced it in the box, and sold it to Allan. Mrs. Phillips, on replacing the stone in the box, found that it was being sought, and, on the trial, proved that the stone was so set in the pin that this stone could not be noticed until it was taken out; and further proved by the evidence of an Edinburgh jeweller that there is a sort of raised setting in the head of the pin to suit this very chip in the stone. The Allans, in addition to the evidence above stated, proved by other jewellers that the stone partook fitted the hole in the lid of their ivory box, and the jeweller who traced the stone from the pin to the ring declared that the diamond was lost to the pin-setting when he first saw it, and some complication of the case, Phillips other than those of a trademan. In further complication of the case, Phillips stated that he had found the diamond out of the box on the evening of the 26th, and that he had not returned it to the box. The jury, after a long hearing, left the Allans saw Mrs. Phillips's diamond ring. Out of these facts the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, and the Lord Mayor saw his way to the decision that the diamond belonged to Phillips.

THE VISIT OF THE PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF WALES TO FLOORS CASTLE, KELSO.

The Prince and Princess of Wales left Kelso by a special train on Saturday night, in time to catch the express up train from York, and arrived in London at half-past eight on Sunday morning. They had been staying since the previous Tuesday with the Duke and Duchess of Roxburghe, at Floors Castle, in the vicinity of the town of Kelso. This mansion, the name of which has been corrupted from the "Palais de Fleurs," the original name, is pleasantly situated on the left bank of the Tweed. It was built, in 1718, by Vanbrugh, but has undergone many alterations and improvements. It has a fine lawn in front of the house, and the verdant park, which is planted with fine old trees, makes this a very agreeable residence in the summer and in fine weather. The Prince and Princess of Wales, with Prince Alfred, arrived there about six o'clock on the Tuesday evening, having passed through Edinburgh on their way the same day from Abergeldie, near Blair Athole, where they had been the guests of the Duke of Roxburghe at the Kelso railway station, and drove in a closed carriage through the town, amidst the acclamations of the people. The company at Floors Castle then consisted of their Royal Highnesses, Prince John of Holstein-Glücksburg, the Duke and Duchess of Athole, the Marquis of St. Albans, and several other guests of rank. Next morning (Wednesday) they attended Kelso races, took their places on the grand stand, and witnessed the running for the Roxburgh Handicap and the Bowmont Stakes. The Princess left the ground before four o'clock, in company with the Duchess of Roxburghe, Princess Hilda, and the Hon. Mrs. Grey, and was again loudly cheered. The Prince remained in the paddock till the close of the races, and afterwards returned with the Duke to Floors Castle. A large dinner-party took place in the evening, which was followed by a grand ball, the festivities during the remaining days of their Royal Highnesses' sojourn, were spent in comparative retirement, except an excursion to the ruins of Roxburgh Castle, a day's shooting, and a fishing-party up the Tweed.

DEPARTURE OF GENERAL SIR DUNCAN CAMERON FROM NEW ZEALAND.

The departure of Lieutenant-General Sir Duncan Cameron, K.C.B., late Commander-in-Chief of her Queen's forces in New Zealand, who has resigned his command on account of disputes which have arisen between himself and the ministers of the Maori war, seems to have excited some regret among the townspeople of Auckland, whose esteem the Colonists and the officers of his Staff appear to have in a degree during their four years' sojourn in that city. When he embarked, on the 1st of August, on board the steamer Wonga-Wonga, for Sydney on his way home, a pretty general demonstration of respect and approval took place, the houses and stores in the principal streets being decorated with flags, as well as the vessels in the harbour—not, indeed, as a sign of rejoicing, but as a mark of honour. The 57th Regiment, with a squadron of the Albert Barracks a platform had been erected well. In the square of the Albert Barracks a platform had been erected for the ceremony of presenting an address by the citizens of Auckland, read by the influential commander of the citizens of Auckland, the Odd-fellows' and Foresters' Lodges, and other benevolent societies, with several bands of music, and a numerous attendance, a guard of honour, composed of men of the 14th and 50th Regiments, with their regimental colours, and a detachment of the Royal Military Train, and some of the Royal Engineers, made up the military array. The crowd of spectators, it was estimated, at the lowest, numbered about 3000. General Sir D. Cameron, with his niece, Mrs. Lereven Grove, wife of Captain Grove, and staff, purchased by public subscription, were then delivered to the General, the Queen, three for the General, and three for Mrs. Lereven Grove, he was escorted in procession down Princes-street, Shortland-street, and Queen-street, to the Wharf, beneath a fine triumphal arch of native shrubs and flowers, with the inscription, "Farewell" over it. Three cheers for the General saluted was fired from the ships and Fort Britomart as the General left the harbour.

WILLS AND BEQUESTS.

The will of Sir John Henry Palmer, Bart., late of Charlton Park, near Brackley, Northamptonshire, who died recently in the London Court on the 6th inst., and the personalty sworn under £160,000, was proved at Doctors' Commons on the 19th inst. by Godfrey Palmer, Bart., and the Rev. Robert Cresswell, the testator was the eldest surviving son of the late Sir Roger Palmer, Bart., M.P., and succeeded to the title and estates in 1817. He married, in 1808, Mary Grace, daughter of the late Sir Thomas Dyke. He was Deputy Lieutenant for the county of Northampton. His will bears date the 25th of September, 1863, and was made while he was in his 82nd year, aged ninety. He leaves to his eldest son his manors, advowsons, messuages, lands, tenements, and real estate; his freehold estate in Ireland, he left to hold as heirlooms with the title. He bequeaths to his daughter Charlotte a legacy of £20,000, and to three of her other children £10,000 each, and to others of them, and to his sons-in-law, legacies of various amounts. He left to his wife the use of his principal residence, and the rest are left to his land agents and servants. To the Northampton Infirmary he bequeaths £100 each, and legacies to his wife free of duty. The residue he leaves equally to be divided between his sons, Sir Geoffrey and the Rev. Francis Palmer.

The will of the Rev. Robert Moore, M.A., Canon of Canterbury, Rector of Ringwould, Kent, and of Lockerbie, Dumfriesshire, who died in London Court, on the 16th inst. The personalty was sworn under £60,000. The executors named are John Moore, Esq., of Lockerbie, brother, and his nephew (these two are the acting executors), and the Rev. John Dennistoun Catherine Hartley Shelley, of Durham; and Henry Talbot Moore, Esq., of Shelton, M.A., Hon. Canon of Durham, and Rector of Sedgefield, Durham, are appointed trustees. The will is dated Sept. 18, 1861; and there are no codicils, with the exception of the last dated Oct. 2, 1865, and executed on the last bearing date June 27, 1865. He died, on Sept. 9, at the advanced age of eighty-eight. He was for 40 years Canon of the Cathedral Archbishop of Canterbury. He stood at the head of the list of Canons of Canterbury, having succeeded thereto in 1834. He was also Rector of Ringwould, and of Latchingdon from 1804. The joint incomes of these two livings were estimated at £1000 per annum, both of which preferments he held at the time of his death. He was also, for a long period, a principal Registrar of the Prerogative Court of Canterbury, and since our appointment, principal registrar of the Court of Admiralty, on the formation of the Probate Court; receiving for the latter office, in addition to his salary, a pension of £1000 per annum. To some extent, to Viscount Sidmouth, a grandson of Archbishop Moore, by whom he was nominated when an infant, and was the only son of the first Viscount, who was speaker of the House of Commons. He bequeaths the interest of the bulk or his property chiefly to his son and daughter before named. There are legacies of £6000 to each of his two grandchildren, by whom he has two grandsons, legacies to other relatives and friends, and also to his servants. To his nephews who are his executors he leaves £1000 each, and appointed £300 for the benefit of the schools at Hendon, endowed by Bishop Moore, and since re-endowed by Archbishop Moore, at Hendon, in the parish of Hunton. To each of the following institutions, viz., the Kent County Hospital, the Canterbury Dispensary, the Maidstone Infirmary, and the Maidstone Lunatic Asylum, he bequeaths £100 each. All legacies are free of duty. The residue of his property is to be divided equally between his son and daughter, Mary, now his daughter, Mrs. Shelley, of Durham, and Henry Osborne, the principal to be held in trust for the ultimate benefit of their children.

The will of John Forrest, M.D., C.B., Inspector-General of Hospitals, late of Queen's Parade, Bath, was proved in the London Court on the 16th ult., and the testamentary property in the United Kingdom was sworn under £18,000. The acting executors and trustees appointed are Mrs. Forrest, the widow, Esq., of Saratoga, and Archibald M'Lachlan, Esq., of Hyde, Isle of Wight; power being reserved to Robert Stone, Esq., Fiscal or Fiscal Stirling, the other executor and trustee. The will is dated Oct. 4, 1858, and a codicil Dec. 17, 1862. The testator died on the 10th of September last. To his wife he has left, in addition to the marriage settlement, the sum of £2000, to his daughter a legacy of £8000, and he bequeaths his son, John Forrest, of Java, residuary legatee.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS.

LORD PALMERSTON.

The Right Hon. Sir Henry John Temple, K.G., G.C.B., M.P., P.C., third Viscount Palmerston, in the peerage of Ireland, and first Baron Palmerston, in the Peerage of Ireland, First Lord of the Treasury, and one of the Representatives in Parliament for the University of Oxford, the eldest son of Viscount Palmerston, by his second wife, Mary, daughter of Benjamin Mee, Esq., of Dublin, was born Oct. 20, 1784, and succeeded, April 17, 1802, as eldest Viscount Palmerston and Baron Temple, which honours, by his own decease, on the 18th inst., devolve upon his brother, Dr. H. J. Temple. Lady Mary, elder daughter of Funiston, first Viscount Melbourne, sister of the Prime Minister and statesman, William second Viscount Melbourne; and widow of Peter Leopold, fifth Earl Cowper. Of Lord Palmerston's education at Harrow, Peterhouse, and Edinburgh, of his rise and unhurried but brilliant progress in political career a full account will be found in another portion of this week's issue. It will be sufficient to say here that he was, in the first place, a statesman of the rarest, the following of which his successful history will show that, for success in peace, and for distinction from talent and merit, the family of Lord Palmerston was on a par with most of the greatest houses of this realm. The Temples, of whom he was one, are of undoubted Saxon origin, which may be traced as far as Sulwen Templer, or Templer, Earl of Chester (by some erroneously styled Earl of Leicester), living in the time of King Athelbald, anno 716, and to be ancestor to the family of Temple. The Templers held eight of Leofric forms to this day the charge in the first and fourth quarters of the Palmerston arms. Sulwen was the Earl of Mercia whose successor, Algar II., lived in the reign of King Ethelred, and had issue Leofric II., the father of Leofric, Earl of Mercia, who married Lady Godiva, to whom he is supposed to be the first Earl of Leicester, in the time of Edward the Confessor, and to have been succeeded by Hugh de Grentmesnil, to whom, as heir-at-law of Algar, the successor of Ethelred, Henry I. granted the earldom of Coventry, which he endowed with no less than twenty-four fiefs, and to whom succeeded Robert Blanchmains, the first, stanch lay in Wellesborough, "which manor (says Mr. William Burton, in his description of Leicestershire) was given to the Templers by the Earls of Leicester, who usually gave the name of Temple to their lands, and the grantee's to their name, as these were given to the Grentmesnils, and inveyled in those parts." However this may be, Henry de Temple was Lord Temple and Baron Cobham, by writ, 1 Edward II., and Sir John Temple, of Stowe, Bucks, whose son, John, lived in the reign of Henry I., and was father of Richard, Lord Temple, who died in 1368, and was succeeded by Sir Richard Temple, of Stowe, Bucks, whose son, Sir John Temple, lived in the reign of King John, who gave some lands in the hundred of Buckingham to Sir Richard de Wyvile, who had succeed him, who lived 24 Edward I.; and by Catharine, daughter of Thomas Lovetoft, had a son, Richard Temple, of Stowe, who, as also his church of Shepey, is commemorated by his picture, drawn in a kneeling posture, in the east window of the church of Sheppey, in Kent, where he died. He married, first, Margaret Barnes, 1471, Elizabeth Lucas, Bridget Wyvile, to Temple's arms; and by his will left Temple an annuity of £10. Temple became possessed of the manor of Stowe, in 1489, and, at the death of that nobleman, went to Ireland, to avoid the resentment of Cecil. In Ireland the family rose to great consideration, and Sir John Temple, Master of the Rolls, and Solicitor-General to Queen Elizabeth, was appointed Attorney-General for Ireland, Sir John Temple, Knight, was a descendant from Sulwen Templer, Earl of Chester, and was a lovely spot on the Liffey, three or four miles from Dublin, close to the Phœnix Park and the Hills of Castleknock, and Lucan, and commanding a recent times the seat of Lord Donoughmore—Sir John Temple's elder son, Henry Temple, married the daughter and heiress of Sir Thomas Osborne, of Upper House in Baron Temple and Viscount Palmerston. Henry, first Viscount Palmerston, was born in 1673, and died in 1757. He was the eldest son of Henry Temple, of Dublin, and Catherine, daughter and heiress of Sir Thomas Osborne, of Elizabeth, daughter of Colonel and Lady Elizabeth Mee, and sister-in-law of General Mee, Colonel of the 1st Irish Regiment of Foot Guards. Colonel Mee married Hartland, where he resided. Lord Palmerston, the elder son of Viscount Palmerston, by his second wife, Jane, daughter of Sir John Mee, Knight, of Dublin, and sister of Colonel Mee, of Hartland, was Palmerston, who, by his second wife, Mary, daughter of Benjamin Mee, Esq., of Dublin, and sister of Colonel Mee, of Hartland, was the late Viscount Temple, G.C.B., Minister at Naples—and two daughters—Frances, who died in 1801, and Mary, who married, in 1797, Peter Leopold, fifth Earl Cowper, and wife of the Right Hon. Laurence Sulivan, P.C.; leaving two sons, of whom the eldest, Laurence Peter, is the present Earl Cowper, and the second, Sulivan, M.A., Rector of Yoxall, Staffordshire; and three daughters—Emily Mary, elder daughter of Funiston, first Viscount Melbourne, sister of the Prime Minister and statesman, William second Viscount Melbourne; and widow of Peter Leopold, fifth Earl Cowper. Of Lord Palmerston's education at Harrow, Peterhouse, and Edinburgh, of his rise and unhurried but brilliant political career a full account will be found in another portion of this week's issue. It will be sufficient to say here that he was, in the first place, a statesman of the rarest, the following of which his successful history will show that, for success in peace, and for distinction from talent and merit, the family of Lord Palmerston was on a par with most of the greatest houses of this realm. NATIONAL SPORTS.

KELSO gave the Prince and Princess of Wales such a reception that the town was described as "keeping a feast of tabernacles." The rain was heavy and the wind was cold; and, as no course is more holding when it is wet, the sport suffered not a little. Curiously enough, the meeting opened on the very day of Lord Palmerston's death with a match won by "Pam by Prime Minister." Mr. Ramsay won the Welter Cup on his Iconoclast, the Marquis of Queensberry second to him—a good omen for Scottish sport; while the clerk of the course, Mr. Usher, in the Black Ranger colours, rode Lord Zetla Afie and Cutaway last year substitutes for his Benvuoirch or cold "Beef and Greens," whose victories were always cheered to the echo. Nevertheless, the course in the rain sadly spoilt the attendance at a capital Harrow meeting. Lord Coryngham, by M.D. was quite the champion of the Curragh, where the "Corinthians" have beats after the old fashion—with the first, save distance in the second, and the win in the third.

The great year for Goodwood and Cambridgeshire course was sadly long and holding, and reflected very little credit on those who took either the booth. Still, it must be remembered that the Duke's week, with 7 lb. extra, met and disposed of an indifferent field, in which a lame herd appeared Young Hampton, who had won second and third, while Jack-in-the-Green was only half a length behind. The Cup course, too, had not been much to boast of, for the third time in a fortnight, excuses were made for The Student keeping his stable. For our part, we much doubt whether Lord Lyon will be lucky horse at three years that he has been at two. Molivata came with a tremendous rush at night, and even the taste of the ground did not damp the Gladstone men, and scores of Freemasons in sashes and "Shakia wear" were to be seen on the heath next day. Thirty-six out of sixty-six accepted—and the Cambridgeshire took place, and played strange pranks there for upwards of half an hour—no joke to a fit. Leger winner with 3 lb. at his back, and more than 2 cwt. on a dead weight. The boy had been practised in the art of beginning, and did not "suffer" so far as usual at the post. The race was well, and went through twenty horses like a rifle-shot, but the last quarter of a mile and the Ditch proved too much for him, and Lady Isoure with Breadalbane at the head of the third division. Neither of these two ever pretended to stay, and how they came out, but still one was won by a head and the other by only a neck.

The Ellis Gardevisure and Rio (who was tried collaterally with Gratitude and heavily backed) for the Chesterfield Cup, but they came right away from the rest, and the former, who was very carefully ridden by Carter, carried no weight, and was well orchestrated, and won the Cambridgeshire a second time for Mr. Sutton. Rio was third, and Lady Isoure fourth. The Two Thousand Guineas was third; The Duke (8st. 2lb.), one of John Day's four, a bad fourth and Regalia and the Queen's Colt were unplaced. Gratitude again belied her Cesarewitch form, as she did last year; Fortuna Doubt is record blood-stock, and this season the gentleman's jockey would have required a telescope to see Catch 'em Alive's winner in 1864, so he brought up, with the rest of the lot, in the extreme rear. The eight leading horses in the betting were the first to the third and fourth started at 25 to 1, and the winner and the second at 33 to 1. The Prince of Wales's Colt, Lord Lyon, by The Duke of Cambridge came by special train from London, and rode their backs at the heath, where the attendance was enormous. On Wednesday there was a perfect deluge of rain, and Rockabob, the conqueror of Robin Hood, was third, and beaten by a neck only for second against a than a neck from Monarch of the Glen, by Stockwell—one of the very few winners that Mr. Payne has trained this season, Rockabob.

A commotion in the Derby of 1866, as well as one of 1867, is void by the death of Lord Palmerston. It was almost the only race he saw in the course of the year, except he happened to be on a visit to a friend himself at leisure on a great Acot day. For fully forty years, beginning with the thick-wooded Epsom, he had been with his own a racehorse at Dunchury, and latterly at H. Gosler's. Diona was his most valued, and Buckthorn probably the best. It is a mystery who was very light below-the-knee, for he formed rather too high Derby weight. He was a handicap-fault and a bad one, and he was sold to his weight, and had fine hand and judgment. At one time he seldom missed the Mayor's stag-hounds when in town, and Dr. Wellesley and he could always count on him when he took the hounds each April to the New Forest, and taught many a lesson to the best of southern M. F. H.'s what stag-hunting was like in that noble wild.

Nothing could stand before Mr. Merry's colt in the Middle Park Plate, as Mr. Spinke's Sea Fly won the Oaks and the Prince of Wales's Tiger the Derby; and the former had the best of it when they met for the silver cup. In the Select Stakes Mr. Spinke's Gladiator beat Lord Stamford's Sea Boat, also by Sofaroi (who died very recently); and, by way of repairing his loss, he gave Mr. Chaplin's Hermit a beating in the Knowles £150 for Canarabo, an increase of £50 on what the old dog who is now in his eighth year won in 1863. In the Prince of Wales's and the Wiltshire Champion, Mr. Beglie's Bush won the Great Western, and Mr. Alcock's Limp the Lowther Stakes, and Mr. Merry's Lady Isoure, by David, were also winners, and Mr. Randell carried off two stakes.

During the past week upwards of 6000 fine mackerel were caught on the Cornish coast, in addition to the large quantity of sardines in very great condition.

It is understood that the ex-Royal family of Naples have accepted the offer made to them by the Emperor Maximilian of Mexico of an asylum on the island of Lacroma, near Trieste.

Our Government has agreed to take part in the proposal made by France for an international conference at Constantinople for preventing the spread of cholera from Asia into Europe.

The Field-Book Diary for 1869, just issued by Messrs. De la Rue and Co., is adorned with a beautiful photographic representation of the Great Eastern Railway Company's admirable accommodation of Mr. Glubber and Professor Phillips, will afford a most interesting acquaintance study. The Pocket Book, made up of several different sizes, and with a variety of ornamental bindings, are adapted to every taste, and their convenience and elegance leave nothing to be desired.

"The Itinerary of Great Britain," just published by Messrs. Bradshaw and Blacklock, is a complete and permanent index to "Bradshaw's Railway Guide;" consisting of, 1st, a list of railways in Great Britain; 2nd, a list of towns, villages, and parishes with 500 inhabitants, showing for each the nearest railway station, the nearest telegraph station, the distance to the station, and the distance from London by road; 3rd, a list of towns with a telegraph station, showing by what lines they are accessible, with other useful information. There is a new and improved map.

THE FARM.

THE chief country topic now seems to be what fairs are to be stopped and what Christmas shows abandoned. The magistrates' order is in some instances a dead letter, as the fair is merely held, in a scrambling sort of way, out of their jurisdiction. The Sussex county show is given up, but "subscribers are requested to pay their subscriptions for 1865 to meet the expenses incurred, and to add to the funds of the show for 1869." The Smithfield Club are to meet at the same time once do the York or the Birmingham, the latter of which gives cups and money to the amount of £1000. Of this the fat cattle get £815 15s., and pigeons and poultry, the great speciality of the show, £167 6s. 6d. We have then the Leicester show, the first ever held in Leicestershire, which had kept very clear of it; but as no cow or bullock can now there be exhibited, and as the country-side talking about it, it is difficult to know what discount is to be taken off the losses for ordinary years. The causes of failure, where the plague has not reached, and that their store beasts, chiefly lambs, are selling well, is to be found, as the neighbouring fairs open to them, and have, therefore, established one for the week. Even the Lincoln Lambs, between Ancelade, Wharfdale, and Nidderdale, where fifty years ago the largest fair was held in England, and the Lord of the Manor, famous of the district, "as newly-imported Irish or foreign stock" need apply, and the cows will rear by the pasture, and be kept entirely apart from the bulls and bullocks. The cattle are to be inspected, and the stock registered, and they will be exhibited in their own pastures two days before the fair. A list of the registrations can be had from Mr. Birkbeck, the secretary, at Settle. To show the importance of the district, one grazier alone has 111 bullocks, nearly all of them to be sold at Lord Ribblesdale's.

Herefordshire is, we believe, free from plague, but foot-and-mouth has made its appearance, and two or three herds are suffering from pleura. The plan of its discovery is curious, and shows that the district shall be worked by its own committee, and elect its own chairman and vice-chairman, who are to be communicated with on any outbreak, which exercises control over the district ones. The payment is 10s. per cent upon valuation, and the owner is to be paid for two-thirds or third of their subscription to begin with. Two young bulls, Francesco (2570) and Gallant Lad (2642)—are to be added to the gold-medal roll of 1863, and the other own brother to a second-prize yearling at the Devon Bath and West of England Meeting, and sold to Mr. Jamaica, a great market for the breed in the late Messrs. Rowe's time. The total sale of stallions and boars and a recent large sale some ten miles off were equally satisfactory.

The well-earned fame of Sir Thomas at the Invington Bury sale, Mr. Bowman's Lancaster Lass, Mr. A. R. Boughton Knight, of Downton Castle; Mr. Robinson, of The Knoll, Ringwood; Mr. Stephenson, of Bridge Farm, Ringwood, from Somersetshire. Prima Donna by King James (978) and her Princess Diana by Sir Thomas (the latter purchased by a friend of Mr. Bereford in May, were bought, each at 40 gs., by Mr. Knight; and Prima Donna with her calf by Mr. Bowman. The Princess Diana and the Fourth (24 gs.) became Mr. Dunham's (who gave a guinea less for the Princess Diana) and Mr. Whitehouse's (who gave 2 gs. more for the Fourth); and Mr. J. R. Whitehouse gave 16½ gs. more for her own sister, Lancaster Lass by Sir Thomas. Five more lots were by Sir Thomas (2228), who bids fair to put his mark on the Hereford herd, as he has now sojourned a year. The eighty-four cows, heifers, and heifer calves made an average of £31 10s. 6d. each, and the eight Sir Thomas bulls (49 gs.), and Patron (50 gs.) passed to Mr. Gregg, Mr. Southern, and Mr. Sayler respectively. We believe that seven bulls out of eleven were bought in.

The statue of the late Lord Combermere, erected at Chester, was unveiled on Wednesday, in the presence of a large assembly. Sir Edward Cust delivered an address.

The first stone of a fountain to be erected in Nottingham, in memory of the late Mr. Alderman Paul, who was twice Mayor of Nottingham, was laid, on Tuesday, by the Mayor, Mr. W. Ray.

The Duke of Cambridge and the Prince of Wales kindly connected with the proclamation of the town hall, now driven outside the suburbs, was performed on Monday by the Lord Mayor of London, in presence of 10,000 persons. Including the two members for the borough, Mr. Rebow and Mr. Miller; Mr. Hall, Mr. Hutton, Mr. Gurdon, Mr. Hawkins, High Sheriff of Suffolk, and Mr. Hall, Mr. Norton, C.B., Commandant of the garrison. Besides the local flags there were those of the Royal Lovalists made some reference to the recent death of the Prime Minister.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

From our City Correspondent.

In the early part of the week the tone of affairs continued to the market for most descriptions of securities was firm, and a steady business was transacted. Subsequently, however, a reaction took place, and prices have not been supported, although the quantity of stock offered is only moderate. The following are the closing prices of the leading stocks:—

In the foreign department the general tendency of the market has been unfavourable, and, consequently, prices have declined. The following are the closing quotations:—

forests of Guadalonpe; this exemption of the country from the plague of reptiles may probably be accounted for by some peculiarity of the soil or the atmosphere.

We present two Views of Basseterre, the seat of Government, which is a town of 9000 persons, situated at the foot of the volcanic mountain called the Soufrière, and having an open harbour or road, protected by Fort Richepance and several batteries. Our Illustrations are engraved from sketches taken by a gentleman who formerly resided in the island. One is a View of the town or city of Basseterre as seen on approaching it by the main road from the north. The other is a view of the public promenade, named the Cours Nolivos, after the Count de Nolivos, who was Governor of the colony in 1765 and who planted the avenue of tamarind-trees which here afforded such an agreeable shelter till they were uprooted by the late storm.

EXPEDITION AGAINST THE CHINESE PIRATES.

It was lately mentioned in our Journal that the pirates who infest the China seas have during the past twelvemonth committed some very daring acts in the vicinity of Hainan, attacking merchant-ships of considerable size under the English, German, and other European flags; and that consequently her Majesty's gun-boat Opossum, commanded by Lieutenant St. John, was sent down to co-operate with the Mandarins for the purpose of capturing the pirates. The accompanying Illustration shows the Chinese fleet, under Admiral Wang-Tung-Yow, with the Opossum in company, preparing for the attack at How-Chow. The Opossum on this occasion captured one pirate junk, heavily armed, which was taken on the 10th of July last; but as there is, no doubt, a nest of these daring outlaws somewhere about Hainan, the Opossum and other gun-boats are about to be sent to Hainan for the purpose of acting, in conjunction with the Chinese Admiral, for suppressing piracy in those parts. The expedition will be commanded by Lieutenant St. John.

Fine Art Supplement TO THE Illustrated London News

"TWO YORKSHIRE BAIRNS."

SOME years ago we presented to our readers an Engraving from a picture by Mr. J. Deffet Francis, in the Exhibition of the Society of British Artists, which displayed a very pleasing treatment of a well-chosen theme; the subject being a Scotch lassie, with a sheaf or bundle of wheat upon her head, returning through the fields at sunset, having been gleaning with pretty fair success. Mr. Francis has contributed to the Wakefield Fine Arts and Industrial Exhibition, which closed last week, the picture we have selected for one of our Illustrations, under the title of "Two Yorkshire Bairns," and which is distinguished by the same commendable qualities that were noticed in his former composition. The genuine native race of Yorkshire folk are a fine robust breed, whose physical constitution is equal to that of any other stock of the English, Scottish, or Irish populations. Mr. Francis seems to have made these varieties of race within the limits of our common nationality a subject of particular study: and in an artistic point of view, as well as connected with interesting historical and ethnological questions, it is certainly worthy of attention. The two young persons whose portraits he has given are excellent specimens of their race. We believe Mr. Francis has rendered essential service to the Wakefield committee in arranging and hanging the fine-art contributions to the exhibition, a View of the interior of which we engraved in our Number for Sept. 23. His own contribution is a charming work, giving, in a bright Venetian key of colour, the beauty of peasant life without its squalor, and commending itself specially by the natural expression and gesture of the girl, so proudly nursing her little brother, and by the childish beauty of the little bairn her charge.

"TWO YORKSHIRE BAIRNS," BY J. DEFFET FRANCIS, IN THE WAKEFIELD FINE-ART AND INDUSTRIAL EXHIBITION.

ALLHALLOWS EVE.

AMONGST the fond popular superstitions of a former age, there were few which took a stronger hold on the imagination of the female sex than the one which Mr. J. T. Lucas has chosen for the subject of a clever drawing, engraved in this Number of our Journal. The last night of October, the vigil of All Saints' Day, was believed, in Scotland especially, as Burns says, in a note to his poems, "to be a night when witches, devils, and other mischief-making beings are all abroad on their baneful midnight errands." But kinder and gentler spirits haunted the rustic hearth on that night. Not only Burns in Scotland, but Gay, Goldsmith, and Bloomfield in England, have borne testimony to the common practice of simple arts of divination, by which, in the mystic hour of Allhallow Even, the fond rustic maidens would attempt to discover the fortunes of their hearts. There were several different ways of obtaining the answer to that most interesting question on which a young girl could seek to be informed. For an engaged couple, it might be prudent before marriage to try, by casting nuts into the fire, whether they would lie still and burn together, or bounce and fly apart from each other. But, for the young woman delineated in our Engraving, who has not yet decided on her choice, the surest and most satisfactory method of knowing who should be her lover and husband was that of eating an apple while she looked in her glass; a method which could not fail of success when the favoured youth himself, presuming on her indulgence and curiosity, had slily found his way into her chamber, and taken his stand behind her back, so that his face should be reflected in the truthful mirror by a very natural magic.

PHOTOGRAPHS FROM THE FARNLEY COLLECTION OF TURNER DRAWINGS.

A FEW weeks back we offered a general notice of the admirable photographs, by Messrs. Caldesi and Co., of Pall-mall, from the collection of Turner drawings in the possession of Mr. F. H. Fawkes, of Farnley Hall, Yorkshire—the finest series of water-colour drawings by our great English landscape-painter belonging to any private gallery. Accompanying that notice we gave an Engraving, after the photograph from Turner's drawing, of the Devil's Bridge of the St. Gothard Pass ("The Teufelsbrücke"); and we promised engravings from three others—which promise we now redeem.

The original of the first of these, "The First-Rate Taking in Stores," is specially instanced by Mr. Ruskin as illustrating Turner's marvellous rapidity of execution as well as memory. It is of the usual size of the drawings of the England series—i.e., about 16in. by 11 in.; the scale is, therefore, considerably larger than the photograph. Though not one of the most highly finished of the Farnley drawings, it is still far removed from slightness. It represents, as we see, a section of the hull of a three-decker from stem to stern, her bows towards the spectator, with her tiers of portholes and guns, anchors and hawsers, part of her stern gallery, her cleains and running and standing rigging to the lower spars all elaborately detailed, and as the whole would be seen towering above a point of sight that might be afforded by an ordinary boat; together with a couple of shore boats delivering stores, looking like toys against her huge flank; another running before the wind; and at short distance two more lighters, riding at anchor, and drawn with equal precision relatively to the distance to which they are removed, the "noble breeze" sea dancing against their broad bows, full," says Mr. Ruskin, "of delicate drawing in its waves. The men-of-war and small craft, the sky, the sea, agitated by wind and tide, and fretting into foam against the swelling, inert, half-wet, and glistening mass of the great hull in the foreground—all seem equally studied directly from nature. And yet we know that this truthful representation of nature, and the detail of all thesshipping, down to the smallest rope, were painted far from theses in the drawing-room of Farnley, in the middle of Yorkshire; for the father of the present proprietor sat beside the painter from the first troke till the last. Turner executed the drawing simply to gratify a wish Mr. Fawkes had expressed to have a representation of a man-of-war. And still more wonderful to relate (always considering the elaborate nature of the subject and the intricacy of the details), in the short space of three hours, between breakfast and a turn at shooting. In the photograph the artist's scale of effect is doubtless occasionally broken, and even lost, owing to the widely different degrees of intensity with which the warm and cold colours are rendered by the photographic process. Yet we are glad to feel the assurance that many of the greatest merits of the original must be reproduced with a fidelity beyond the reach of engraving. How persistently Turneresque, for instance, is the skilful management of the sudden perspective of the ship's side; the expression of the union in the great hull of vast bulk and weight with buoyancy, the unfaltering marking of the deep shadows under the mighty timbers of the bows, and the watchful indication of reflected light from the dancing waves on the wet side, together with the independent completeness of the fittings and rigging, and the rigid fastness of the standing rigging, in contrast with the flapping laxity of the running rigging.

The second drawing, which we engrave, is peculiarly interesting as, in the opinion of Mr. Ruskin, the most competent authority on such a point, marking Turner's transition from his first to his second style. Placing Turner's period of studentship or development as between 1790 and 1800, his "first style" may be said to extend over the next twenty years—from 1800 to 1820. This first style (to which most of the Farnley drawings belong) is distinguished by boldness of handling, generally gloomy tendency of mind, subdued colour (hence this series is better adapted for reproduction by photography), and perpetual reference to nature or the works of other painters. His second style (1820-1835) may be recognised by "delicate deliberation of handling, cheerful mass of mind, brilliant colour, defiance of precedent, and effort at ideal composition." The second subject engraved, "Mont Cenis—Snowstorm," is dated by the painter himself, on the foreground to the right, "January 15, 1820," where, too, he entitles it "Passage of the Mont Cenis." The reader will be glad to have Mr. Ruskin's description of this drawing :—

The scene is on the summit of the pass, close to the barrier—at what seems to have been a hospice at that time. I do not remember any such at present—a small, square-built house, built as if partly for a fortress, with a detached night of stone steps in front of it, and a kind of drawbridge to the door. This building, about 60 or 100 yards off, is seen in the left of the picture, in dim light, which, by help of a violent blast of mountain wind, has broken through for depth of clouds which have gathered round the Col. The wind is so violent as to collect—nothing but that roof of drifting cloud ; but neither is there any veight of darkness : not high nor is too thin for it, and so sympathetic with the cold, the many bases of the granite hills jetting out here and there grimly through the snow wreaths. There is a certain resemblance in the form of these hills (in number 16) marked on it so long, ghastly figures, and with a sort of rude effort at the human face in the rocks, to the drawing of Glencoe, but infinitely more grand is the view and infinitely more solemn and awful the effect. The whole horse, unable to face the wind, have turned right round with fright, the passengers, struggling to regain their saddles, have only a little further on is another carriage off the road, some figures pushing at its wheels and its driver at his utmost leads, spilling and hurrying the horses on again. But the sense stretched out against the light of the distance, though too far off for the whip to be used.

This drawing does not prefect all the characteristics of Turner's second style, but in the vividness of conception, in the bold recognition of the lurid snow-clouds overhead, and the chastly light beyond—the spectral phenomena thus becoming an important and distinct conception, and again, in the delicate and keen discrimination of colour, indicated probably by the strange aspect of the scene—colour that henceforth is to become not a subordinate attribute, but an essential element of design. In all this may be detected the awakening of a new sense or faculty in the painter's mind never again to lie dormant, but to mould the glorified memories with the present impression of nature and reproduce them with all the magic of the former power.

The third subject we have selected has no adventitious or extrinsic interest : we select it only as a representation of Turner's power in remarkable scene, and as one of the most powerfully-painted and impressive drawings of the series. There is another view of the "Lake of Reichenbach" among the Farnley drawings, taken nearer the fall, from the shoulder of rock seen on the spectator's left in our Engraving ; but, though showing the full height and leap of the water with more awful concentration of interest than even here, it does not approach this drawing in completeness and unity of impression. Here we have the great fall and also several of the series of cascades by which the torrent gains that vast height. It is seen in the distance, from the natural division of the scene, in the point of view chosen, pouring over equal ledges, and with nearly equal masses of water in the fall, seize a degree of symmetry rarely seen in Turner's compositions ; yet, we are not sure that this does not add to the awe of the scene, and fulness and framing to the story of the fall, as Mr. Ruskin might, could, or would, describe it. Everything converges towards the torrent ; massive drawings of the stones at the edge of the water break ; the order is dissolved, and, in sheer confusion, they hurry down, giddy, headlong, and aghast, striving to escape the fate of those who fall with all the beauty of loving pity, the sun throws his iridescent rays, brilliantly they drop, pearl-like, in the transparent spray, in churning, swirling, boiling cauldron, foaming with hungry madness for things of interest whom the smoke of their destruction is over. There, after that great lapse, they lie in purgatorial depths lost to human eye and thought, and, overwhelmed by the fall, the stones that respond to their stilled sobs, fill they emerge, far away—perhaps still soiled with the earth-stains, perhaps changed through gloomy gorge, choked with blasted and uprooted pines, rolling in the mountain channel, rolling in stony bed—on, till, old and worn, they glide into the peace of the placid river, reflecting the sky and the trees. It is the far-off scenes of their youth, and, by-and-by, to be translated into the new life and rewarded with the unknown and unbounded joys of the sea, their final and everlasting home.

A letter has been received from Jedda, dated the 27th ult., of which the following is the substance :—"Information has been received from Mecca to-day, stating that Mr. Cheesman, the agent sent by us, has obtained his freedom ; he even suffers much. In two years his hair has turned from black to perfect white. His wife and children are also released in a very bad way. It is said that King Theodore, who is about to send to Russia to come and take Cassrow from the Sultan's Majesty's object being to imprison Rassam also, as Rassam is believed to have formed improper relations with certain members of the Emperor's."

A notice issued by the Postmaster-General states that on the 1st of November, and thereafter, the rates of postage on all foreign postage on a prepaid letter addressed to Sweden, and specially directed to be sent "via Hamburg," will be reduced from 1s. 10d. to 1s. 4d. the single letter ; and the postage on a prepaid letter addressed to Sweden, and specially directed to be sent "via Prussian mail," will be reduced from 1s. to 10d. the single letter. All letters, however, addressed to Sweden, and not specially directed by any other route, will be forwarded in the mails for Denmark. But, in consequence of the foregoing arrangements, the rates of postage on Uddevalla will continue to be forwarded, as a rule, by the Swedish mail-packets from Hull, during that portion of the year when navigable.

LORD HOUGHTON ON GOOD MANNERS.—A working man's club was opened at Guelforth, near Sunderland, on the 17th inst., and addressed by Lord Houghton ; Lord Frederick Cavendish, M.P. ; and other gentlemen. Lord Houghton, in the course of his address, said he was glad that because they were compelled to labour, and even to labour hard, there-in the interests of that labour—they were not to have the rest and the abilities and privileges of good society. It rested entirely with themselves and on their choice whether they should have it or not. They were to have society depended on several things. It was, perhaps, mainly a question of manners. "What were manners? Sometimes they were the mere habit of women met each other in society ; they were the condition of the intercourse of the rough ; and they were consequently the mere habit of the higher classes of the community ; very rough and ready rules of conduct, which, when they were understood, made society comfortable. They had, however, nothing to do with wealth or position. They were the habit of good society in the east of the world, and in all those countries he found exactly the same manners in the very highest and the very lowest ; and the reason was, the nobleman who was called a Pacha and who lived in his great palace at Cairo or Alexandria, as in the Arab in the desert, had the same habit of courtesy in the fields. The civility, the courtesy, the gentleness, the consideration shown by the people for one another was the same. It was the very essence of society ; but could just as well be acquired by the poor man's cottage as by the rich man's palace. Manners were not costly. That was for his friend who hoped his children would be rich, that they might have the advantages they would enjoy in it, would encourage them to achieve. They were not to suppose that manners were confined to the upper ; he had been a time when Englishmen of the highest class had bad and uncomfortable and disagreeable manners because they did not think it worth them to take as an illustration the habit of intemperance. That was a great vice, which destroyed a man's faculties of enjoyment, and which, if it took away from himself, which lost for him his power of being of use to himself or anybody else, which made him a mere animal, destroyed his manners. Nevertheless, there was a time when there was a great deal of that vice, and regular habits which were considered to be the highest used—that when a man was a gentleman he dared to say they all would used—that when a man was a gentleman he was "as drunk as a lord." He did not know that that class of the community was particularly addicted to drunkenness—in fact, they were rather the contrary. But there was no doubt that a hundred years ago, and further back, general intemperance was the habit of the upper, as it was now the reproach of the lowest, class of the country. But that habit had nothing to do with people being rich or poor—it was simply a gross and stupid self-indulgence, which the lord might practise just as well as the peasant, the wealthy merchant as the very humble artisan. It was a habit of which he had never practised the slightest imitation, but of which he hoped they would be ashamed. He would say nothing about liability to intemperance, or that very reason that there was no reason why the poor man should not have the power of enjoying all the advantages and comforts which could be derived from any natural produce, whether malt or anything else.

FINE ARTS.

PHOTOGRAPHS FROM A. W. PUGIN'S SKETCHES.

THE photographs of the sketches of the late Augustus Welby Pugin, by Mr. Ayling, of Oxford-street, to which we have already drawn attention, are of so much value and interest to lovers of Gothic that no apology will be needed for giving them more consideration than that we have hitherto had space to afford them. Whatever may be thought of Pugin's onesidedness and partisanship, of his want of moderation and eccentricities ; no one will dispute the degree of suspicion with which he may be regarded by the more rigid Protestants for having become a Roman Catholic, and for having taken orders in the Romish priesthood ; and others, there is no doubt he was a great architectural artist, and would have taken high rank in his profession, even had he not, by writing, forced his claims upon the attention of the public, and also domestic, purposes all over the land. It is true, he had not many very favourable opportunities for displaying his knowledge practically ; yet the Roman Catholic cathedral in St. George's-fields, and numerous extensive series of "sketches," that we must look for the measure of Pugin's intellectual power. Knowledge, invention, skill, and feeling ; and to them must unquestionably be attributed no small share in the marvellous development of Gothic which characterises our ornament during the last quarter of a century. How much of the Romanesque, Byzantine, Italian, and bastard architectural and decorative art which now gladdens the eye of the philosophic, may not be due to the authority and example in Pugin's works ?—as in his "Glossary of Ecclesiastical Ornament and Costume ;" "Specimens of Gothic Architecture, Selected from Ancient Examples ;" "Description of Decorative Detail from the eleventh to the beginning of the sixteenth century ;" his "Details of Ancient Timber Houses," "Examples of Gothic Architecture," "Contrasts," and his Designs for "Gold and Silver Smiths," for "Iron and Brass Work," and for "Stained Glass Windows," and for "Tiles," all of these works consists in the numerous and accurate precedents they supply, and the suggestive sketches in which they abound. The photographs from Pugin's sketches now before us. We have already arrived at the estimate we have formed of them, but the following extracts of designs made on the principle of selection and adaptation prove that we must add to it the merit of considerable originality. See on eye. And if we must still refer to precedent we cannot have too faithful a representation of that which we propose to imitate. "Let nature be consulted, and her works copied, on the spot" by such an artist as Pugin are peculiarly precious, reproducing as they do the actual sketches made by the master himself, and, indeed, than those copies and memoranda drawn and afterwards elaborated by Pugin himself, and by him engraved, lithographed or engraved merely under his direction, even by such facile lithographers as J. D. Harding.

These sketches will surprise those who know Pugin well. They have in a remarkable degree, been the result of observation from nature. Such fidelity is not often seen in architects' drawings. There is wonderful freedom in their masterly draughtsmanship, and they are devoid of the slightest appearance of conventionality. Evidently they give a complete impression of the character and noteworthy details of the subject, together with the impression made upon the mind and intention of the designer of the object he sets himself to record, and his sketches are, in like manner, not mere memoranda or a copyist ; you have a perfect comprehension of structure in the perspective, unencumbered by any attempt at construction ; you have the governing principle or style of the decoration and the leading features of the detail clearly and forcibly expressed, and generally a most remarkable clearness and truth. This handsome volume of sketches is a perfect mine of suggestion, example, and authority for the use of every branch of the art, while to the amateur, the ecclesiologist, archæologist, and man of taste it is also a most interesting work. The photographic process is peculiarly to the convenient dimension of a book for the drawing-room table : though it might be desirable in some instances that the individual have preferred to have seen the photographs on a larger scale : the selection seems judicious, and the arrangement is pleasing. Pugin himself, and some of which are instructive, are so microscopically minute as to be scarcely legible. The index, which is a useful subject, the trouble also would have been spared of referring to the index. The sketches are dated from 1827 to 1843, and consist of views, sections, and details of each subject have been taken. Plans, sections, and details of each subject have been added, the whole number of the illustrations exceed 150. The collection consists of the celebrated foreign sketches from the year 1836, concluding with his journey to Italy in 1837, and including a few sketches in Belgium. The principal sketches of a large proportion of the principal objects of interest and beauty in the northern parts of Belgium, Italy, and Southern Germany ; it renders the picturesque effect of churches, sepulchral monuments, screens, the old towns-halls, guild-houses, bridges, and ruins ; the quaint compositions formed by the buildings of Nuremberg and Augsburg, the rich and varied architecture of the public and hotel-de-ville piles of France and Belgium ; and it presents authentic examples of art and design in architecture and ornaments numberless examples of art and design in architecture and ornaments, fittings of screens, screens, altars, capitals, reliquaries, lecterns, candelabra, chalices, monstrances, censers, mazier stones of ecclesiastical and mediæval costume, illustrations from frescoes, paintings, and rare vestments, memorial and wayside crosses ; examples that in the present condition of taste will be seen yet greater taste ; lovely details often brought to light from unknown or neglected sources, and from old monastic establishments, from forgotten hiding-places, Rouen, Paris, Amiens, Beauvais, Ghent, Bruges, Brussels, Antwerp, Malines, Louvain, Liege, Aix-la-Chapelle, Florence, Venice, Milan, Mechlin, Bruges, Ghent, Antwerp, Brussels, Louvain, Liege, Nuremberg, Augsburg, and Munich, and the Swiss towns have been carefully sketched, as it were, for the treasures here collected. We must add a word of praise for the manner in which the photographs have been executed by Mr. Ayling. In some instances the sketches were executed in pencil on toned paper ; and professional photographers have been yet more great in such cases was the difficulty which Mr. Ayling has surmounted.

MR. COPE'S NEW PICTURE IN THE WESTMINSTER PALACE.

Mr. Cope, R.A., has painted a picture (which is called finished) another of the series of paintings for the Peers' Corridor of the Westminster Palace, the first of which he has painted during the twelve years. As the slab upon which the picture has been executed is, we understand, on the point of being inserted in the wall of the Corridor, we lay no time in giving a full and satisfactory account of the work, which we find in Mr. Gullick's excellent "Descriptive Catalogue of the Fresco Paintings in the Westminster Palace," recently reviewed in this Journal. The subject is "The Meeting Queen Eleanor and Prince Edward at Dover Harbour ;" and as a work of art the picture is one of the most spirited and effective of the series.

The relief of Gloucester (September, 1644) was the first great check to Charles I. But the first step of importance was the battle of Newbury, of which ended with the taking of Bristol, been followed by a successful siege of Gloucester, which, commanded by Colonel Massey, resisted all the western counties, and the King, as, at all events, it was thought at the time, had in his grasp the whole western counties. Gloucester was the key of Gloucester was most pertinacious ; but it was on the very point of capitulating, when the approach of Essex with his army relieved and the ammunition reduced to the last extremity, arrived with a large supply of ammunition under Essex, of which the train bands formed a considerable portion. After relieving the city of Gloucester, the King, the relieving army marched back towards London, and, when attacked by the King's forces at Newbury, the train bands acquitted themselves most creditably. "The trained bands," says Clarendon, "and auxiliary regiments (of whose inexperience of danger, or any kind of service beyond the easy practice of their postures in the Artillery Garden, men had till then no cheap estimation), behaved themselves so resolutely, and with so much obstination, behaved themselves so resolutely, and with so much obstination, that they stood their ground like a wall, and entirely repulsed the assault, and kept their ground so steadily, that, though Prince Rupert himself led up the best troops to charge them, and endured their storm of small shot, he could make no impression upon their stand of pikes, but was forced to wheel about ! Of so sovereign benefit and use is that readiness, order, and dexterity in the use of their arms, which hath been much neglected."

The train bands date from the sixteenth century, long before the first formation of a standing army. The old City Trained Band was established in 1585, during the fear of the Spanish invasion. The present Honourable Artillery Company, which even yet plumes themselves of all our regiments of volunteers, and of which the Prince of Wales is Colonel, represents, in direct descent, the old train bands ; and the corps is justly proud of its ancient origin and titles to fame. The present Artillery Ground, Finsbury, where the corps now drills and parades, is the "Artillery Garden," spoken of by Clarendon. The bands, previously to 1622, met for drill in Tanel-close, now Artillery-lane, Bishopsgate-street Without.

There is an account in "Whitelock's Memorials" (p. 63) of the marching forth of the train bands and militia in November of the year preceding the relief of Gloucester, to join Essex in the defence of the metropolis against the Royal forces in Hounslow Heath. The city bands were commanded by Major-General Skippon, who, says Whitelock, made short encouraging speeches to the soldiers, telling them "that they were to fight for their wives and children and for their religion, and that if they did not valiantly they would be undone. Remember the cause is for God, and for the defence of yourselves, your wives, and children, and your religion ; and, therefore, pray, play lustily and heartily and God will bless us."

In the picture, two of the regiments of train bands, the one on before consisting of pikemen and that behind of musqueteers, are marching to a close order, preceded by their officers, sergeants, and drummers. Sir Richard Cholmley the men pass forward, some ringing—one lusty young tosser having actually pressed his drum into the service—in front of the regimental. A commanding officer, riding beside the musqueteers, who may be no other than Major-General Skippon himself, is addressing the men, and pointing with his right hand to the Royal army. Presently further soldiers appear, amongst over a low wall, look inquisitively into his face. Just coming in view in the foreground are two ladies, apparently the present struggling to halt, however, and rifles were attached to our armies at a very early period : blunderbusses still adhere to them in one of his days. Spectators line the streets and crowd at the windows, some weeping, others cheering, as they are relative or friend go by, and all waiting for the intelligence of the departure of fellow-citizens, many of whom are never to return. Nearly all the spectators wear ribbons, or favours, in their hats, the colour of the Parliamentary Association. Before proceeding further, we may remind the visitor that he is looking at a picture painted in the year 1848, and not in the year 1644, and that the fashioned buildings and overhanging eaves will assist correctness, and are almost entirely conjectural. It is evident, however, that the artist has been careful to be faithful to the spirit of the time, and pictures the crowd, for all that he has depicted. For his representation of Temple-bar (which, it will be seen, bears a prospective view) he has had the present structure to go by, however, in direct authority. The buildings on the left include the mansion of the Goldsmiths' Company, which may well suppose that the ancient hall and Gresham's and other banks was then the banking side of the street, and that the smaller mansions were the residences of the wealthy. The picture affords a happy allusion to the connection between the city and the town, and a clear indication of the site of Temple-bar, which, in a niche above the buttress of the church wall on the left, is seen to be flanked by a wall in the course of being pikerailed with the notice issued for shops to close on the day appointed for the train bands to march.

Returning to the spectators, the most prominent group is that of a comely looking matron, apparently a widow, who is seated with a sister or friend in the roof of the battlemented porch of her own house. A fear trickles down the mother's cheek ; but she is evidently resigned to the churchyard wall, does splash at parting from her lord. Her younger boy looks up into his mother face with perplexity, and, perhaps, fear ; but elder and a taller stands upon the ground from which he seeks consolation. A little further to the left a wedded, with a child in her arms, and a boy by her side, is evidently in emotion, though, possibly, her sorrow may be lightened by the presence of a husband, who is accompanied only by two daughters—a pretty girl of sixteen, and a younger child, with a little boy by her side, and a young woman beside him on the other. Beyond and above these foreground figures, at the front of a house with projecting upper stories, and bearing the sign, and the ancient arms of the city of London, stands the energetic Lord Mayor Farrington, whose name is immortally and confidently associated with the scene on a truncheon or baton, and looking as though himself ready to take the command of soldiers before the Royal army. Behind him is a matron and a lady—maybe his daughter—and two or three friends, perhaps other representatives of the city.

On the right the spirit of religious opposition, the greatest enemy with which the King had to contend, is seen in the person of a Puritan preacher on the one preaching, in his hand a book, and his eyes fixed upon the sky, as though he had church already mentioned, in order to be within hearing of the train band bands, when, as he goes, he fanatically addresses them, we may be sure, some of the favourite Puritan exhortations on similar occasions, such as "How long, O Lord, how long?" and "Vengeance, O Lord!" He is not all greater emphasis to his injunctions, he wields a sword high in the air, the minister turns to the preacher, and, with his hand on his left breast, who was at this time preacher to St. Paul's and the militia. The intense-visaged Puritan soon has, praying and preaching, the church-yard wall, does with a sufficiently ostentatious display of zeal and fervour. One of the flags run out from the house has the suggestive device of an anchor with the words, "Only in Heaven."

The portrait by Mr. Grant, R.A., of the late Lord Palmerston, painted for Harrow School, has been placed at the Royal Academy for two or three years since, has been excellently engraved by Messrs. F. Holl and C. Lewis, Jun., for the Art Union of London, after the sack Graves, of Pall-mall. As the last portrait for which the Premier sat, and the work of one of the distinguished painters of the country, we have no doubt the plate will become a popular memorial of the great statesman.

MUSIC.

The Royal English Opera began their second season at Covent Garden on Saturday evening, when an English version of Meyerbeer's popular opera, "Le Prophète," the Africaine," was produced in a manner and with a success which give good promise of a prosperous campaign. The scenery and dresses in every piece are of the magnificence during the whole evening was loud and continuous. The demonstrations of public favour on the first night must not be taken with some qualification ; but on this occasion they appeared, on the whole, to express a just and discriminating estimate felt by the generality of the audience. In regard to the merits of the opera itself there is little or nothing now to be said. The performance was on the same scale during the latter part of the Royal Italian Opera season, and the great quantity of criticism to which those performances gave rise will be found in the English public journals. It is a work which, with all its faults, must be regarded as a lasting monument to the memory of the last of the great dramatic composers of French fame. Even in the department of the drama ; a fault that could never have been anticipated, seeing that Scribe, the author of the libretto, was one of the greatest which ever existed : but such is the case. The plot of the "Africaine" is confused, incoherent, and the catastrophe, the suicide of the hero, the celebrated maritime discovery, is so wretchedly drawn—so poor, mean, and feeble—as to destroy the whole interest of the subject. As to the music, it is liable, in some degree, to the charge of meanness and poverty of dramatic force, which, nevertheless, generates into noise and approaches the confines of vulgarity : but it manifests an inexhaustible fund of melodious invention, a rich and elegant vein of picturesque effects ; and is so rich and varied in construction, harmony, and instrumentation that it would be heard again and again without becoming fresh beauties. With respect to the performance, it clearly resembled that which the public had formerly seen at the Royal Italian Opera was the same company, the same chorus, the same gorgeous mise en scene : the differences consisting in the substitution of an English for an Italian version of the words and in the new cast of the characters. The English version is well executed ; the words are generally good, and many lines are extremely poetical, musical, and beautiful. The cast is also excellent, and, with the exception of Mr. Costa for the sake of lessening the excessive length of the performance, have not been curtailed pieces for which the Parisian stage is distinguished, full of sprightly badinage, but without any serious interest. It was excellently acted and sung; the principal characters being sustained by Misses Sosse and Blanche Galton, Miss Fanny Reeves, Mr. Miles Cuzner, Mr. Connell, and Mr. Bentley.

At the Middlesex Sessions, a few days ago, an unsuccessful attempt was made to deprive the Hanover-Square Rooms of their license. According to the strict letter of the law, however (says the Musical World), the licenses granted to the proprietors of our concert-rooms have all long since been illegal. The Act of Parliament under which music licenses are granted states distinctly, that in no licensed "house, room, or garden," shall musical performances take place before five in the afternoon; and there is not a single one of our concert-room in London where morning concerts have not been given from time to time. At every West-End concert-room the law has certainly been broken in this particular; and in the case of every such breach it is provided by the Act that the licenses of such conditions have not been observed shall be renewed." This anomaly in the status of the law applies to the Opera-houses.

Verdi is said to be on his way to Paris, to superintend the rehearsals of his last opera, "La Forza del Destino." The production of this piece at both the Italian Theatres has been repeatedly promised. Why has the promise not been fulfilled by either?

We (Watchman and Christian Witness) understand that Jullien and Chapter, at a meeting in the chapter-room, on Saturday last, agreed to grant the use of the cathedral and college-hall, as usual, for the musical festival next year, agreeably to the request made to them by the committee formed for the promotion of the festival.

Mr. Mallandaine's opera, "Lara"—which, it will be remembered, was produced in an English version by Mr. Oxenford, at Her Majesty's Theatre, under Mr. Harrison's management, last season—has just been revived at the Opéra Comique.

The new opera-house built at Chicago, and opened on the 1st of August last, is said to be the largest and most splendid theatre in the world—sufficient to make the Scala and the San Carlo, not to speak of Her Majesty's Theatre and Covent Garden, hide their diminished heads. It was built, at the cost of 1,000,000 dollars, by a single individual, named Hudson, who, having gained in a few years a large fortune by the manufacture and sale of liqueurs, has erected this theatre to mark his gratitude towards the town to which he owes his wealth. The house, it is added, can hold comfortably 5000 persons, and even numbers 500 voices, and the company includes the best singers to be found in America.

The funeral of the lamented William Vincent Wallace took place on Saturday, at the Kensal-green Cemetery. The procession was followed to the grave by many sorrowing relatives and friends and persons of distinction in the musical world.

MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS.

A Manual of Singing, for the use of Choir-trainers and Schoolmasters. By Richard Mann, Inspector of Choirs in the Archdeaconry of Sudop. (Novello.) This book, though not free from faults, or at least what we consider such, is a very valuable and useful compendium. It is not, like the multitude of musical instructions daily issued from the press, a mere repetition of the same common-place truisms which such publications are filled, but contains matter which, if not absolutely new, is new in method and treatment. It is a text-book for persons engaged in teaching the most popular branches of vocal music and such persons will find it, we think, very useful. It sets out with a number of practical advices to teachers, which, though they have never, so far as we know, been reduced to writing, are as generally neglected, as they are undeniable, of great importance. Take the following as a specimen :—"Never tell your pupils that singing is an easy accomplishment to acquire, rather with a statement of its difficulties. At the same time assure them that steady hard work will be certain to lead to success. Encourage. Keep your choir in good humour with themselves; never let them get guilty of their own failures; point out their merits, and bestow a little a word of encouragement or praise from you will never be thrown away. Type the lesson as much as possible, and never lose sight of the practical part to test the voices in turn. Let there be no break in the lesson from the beginning to the end of the hour. The attention of the pupils will thus be retained, and all laughing or talking avoided. The length of the lesson should not be great at first; one hour is ample. In the printed lessons, the Roman numbers to represent the notes of the scale, the author believes he obtains all the advantages to be derived both from the Tonic Sol-fa system (somewhat that of always calling the key-note Do) and the more modern and more popular French system (that of always calling it Doh). If the choir-master wishes to teach on the former system (the Tonic Sol-fa) he can do so simply by calling I, Doh; II, Ray; III, Me; IV, Fa; V, Soh; VI, La; VII, Te; VIII, Doh; Re, Mi, &c.' This is obviously expressed, and in so far as we can intelligible it is incorrect. The old system of solmisation is by no means practical (as our author himself admits, or he would not suppose) with the "Tonic Sol-Fa system," the method of notation borrowed by the Rev. Mr. Curwen from the old and forgotten system of Sarmisen, and now in great vogue throughout England. Our author takes no notice of Mr. Curwen's system, notwithstanding its avowed efficiency, and has evidently preferred to adopt one of the methods in use before its introduction. For our part, we are inclined to regard the opening statement of the author as true, that Professor Taylor and Mr. Turle (the eminent organist of Westminster Abbey) had in vocal exercises, "simplified" the old system of names of the notes, but that it is better to vocalise simply by singing the syllable "la." Indeed, this statement is borne out by the exercises before us. If in some, why not in all ? The book contains clear and concise explanations as to the register of voices, the major and minor scales, the cultivation of the voice, the pronunciation of words in singing and chanting, and a series of vocal exercises. Among the rules of pronunciation we read, with pleasure, that "the letter R . . . when it is pronounced as though written rhe before all words beginning with a vowel and as ther before all words beginning with a consonant, 'rhe angel,' 'ther lord.'" Is the author a London cockney? The vocal exercises are the most valuable portion of the book. They cater for the different registers of male and female voices; many of them are taken from the works of the great masters, and are excellent as far as the whole are selected with great care, taste, and judgement.

We have already had occasion to speak of the skill and felicity manifested by Mr. William Ellis in the art of combining the two elements of song, poetry and music, and we think that he has not been equalled by any literary man of the day, except, perhaps, by John Oxenford. To excel in this art it is necessary to unite the imagination of the poet with the grace, refinement, and technical knowledge of the musician. This combination of qualities Mr. Ellis possesses in a high degree, and has contributed to the store of lyrical poetry and vocal music. We need scarcely remind our readers of his beautiful and popular "Songs of Many Seasons," in which the finest melodies of the illustrious composer are united to English verses more appropriate, in many instances, more agreeable to English taste than the words to which the airs were originally written. Mr. Ellis has now published a set of songs, "Songs of Kirkton, Ala, and other living German composers, which have become familiar to many of our readers, with English or fitting garbs in which Mr. Ellis has clothed them; nor of his collection of "Rounds and Canons," which has become a standard work. He has now made a fresh contribution to our stock of vocal music, "Vocal Trios, arranged and adapted to English words, just published by Messrs. Cocks and Co. It consists of short and simple airs, selected chiefly from the works of Mozart, Rossini, Weber, Bishop, &c., and arranged as trios for male or female voices, and united to words for the most part by Mr. Hills himself. The original harmonies are preserved, and the notes are so happily united to the words that the music is at once easy to sing and delightful to the listener. They are intended to be sung without any instrumental accompaniment, and thus form charming exercises in part-singing. We wished to point out two or three as being especially good, but we find all of them so delicious that we really cannot make a choice. We may, however, mention the famous fairy song in the "Midsummer Night's Dream," united to one of the most charming trios in Mozart's "Zauberflöte," as being one of the happiest adaptations that can be conceived ; and we may quote Mr. Hills's verses for a "rollicking" (so popular German melody) as a specimen of his talent as a lyrical poet :—

The princely lords of Germany
Once met in fierce debate,
And each—so runs the story—
Would have a wife to wed,
And claim'd to be first in state.

"My Lords," said he of Saxony,
"To be first I claim the right ;
My lands are rich in meadows,
From whence, as from the fountains,
I have sixty cups of bright."

The next who spoke was bluff Conrad,
The Lord of a hilly land,
And he spoke, with rapture glowing,
Of its vales where the vintage
Of its hills, and its grand Rhine wine,

Of wealthy towns and minsters proud,
Then spoke Baron Ulrich next ;
Oh, stern he look'd, and proudly,
And in calm'd his lofty crest ;
They should yield him their sward.

Then Eberhard of Wirtemberg,
With his beard of silver white,
Uprose and spoke soberly,
As he rose count and knight,
Like a brave and gallant knight.

"No wealthy towns, nor minsters proud,
Nor silver cups have I,
But proud am I, possessing
My subjects' love and loyalty,
For there's not a man in all the land
But for my sake would die."

Then up arose the princely lords
And swore 'twas he alone
And thus was he rewarded,
While golden crowns were handed
That he who owned his people's love
Was first in state indeed.

In the richest lord of all.

The following additional appointments are announced by Mr. Sims Reeves in singing, at one of the Philharmonic concerts at Liverpool, a new song Sir Olaf's Vow, composed by Mr. Henry Richards. We have since obtained a copy of the song (published by Cramer), and we are not surprised at the great favour it met with. English tenor. The subject is very pathetic. "It is founded," says the publisher, in a note prefixed to the music, "on a tragic and affecting incident in the famous reign of Kenneth, when the king's mistress with his beloved wife Anita and a few faithful followers. His little band scattered, hunted down by land and sea, and finally in a mountainary refuge at Rimini, where Anita died from exhaustion. Garibaldi was the first to give the last office of affection, and tore himself away from her unburied corpse, which was saved by the faithful companions of her husband, and scarcely recognised in the poor wasted form the great chieftain's wife." The words, by Mr. Bennett, are unique in style. His music is not in the ballad form, but rather in that of the Italian cavatina—a form more suited to such a theme as graceful, and comparatively seldom adopted in English music. The melody is full of impassioned expression, and, as sung by Mr. Reeves, could not fail to make a deep impression on the audience.

THE THEATRES.

The commencement of the dramatic season is full of promise. Three theatres are now successfully engaged in the representation of the legitimate drama. At Drury Lane "Macbeth" and "Othello" continue to attract good houses, and "Julius Cæsar" will be performed this evening, with a cast including Mr. Phelps as Mr. Anderson, and Mr. Swinbourne. Next Saturday "King John" is promised, with Mr. Phelps as King John's nephew, Arthur. At the Standard Mr. Creswick and Mr. Ryder have been performing "Hamlet" to good houses; and on Thursday "Henry IV." was produced. At the Queen's Theatre, Long Acre, Mr. and Mrs. Alan Marriott has performed both the Prince of Denmark and Romeo to full houses. A new piece, a dramatic version of Dickens's novel "Sarah-no-Rogue," by Mr. Adolphus C. Shelley. The principal characters are Mr. Alan Marriott, Miss Fanny Josephs, Miss Lydia Davis, and Miss Leigh. "The Haymarket is still rendered attractive by Mr. Charles Mathews's "At Home," which is now the 34th delphi by the singular display of histrionic ability made by Mr. Jefferson in the character of Mr. Golightly. At the Princess's Mr. C. S. Shellham's new farce, entitled "Dinner for Nothing," is a success as well as a peculiarity. The notion of a cosmopolitan dinner-party, at which Mr. C. J. Smith, a thorough cockney, gratuitous table for foreigners is as new as it is extravagant. No wonder that Mr. Augustus Harris should be in a hurry to close the arrangement. Accordingly they cosspire together, and by the aid of theatrical contrivances, the dinner is transformed into a scene of generous invitation. The Frenchman, the Italian, the German, the Swede, and the Japanese, all vie with Mr. Herbert, who has painted a new act-drop, with a subject, that of Cedric the Saxon repulsing the Maurice de Bracy before the siege of Torquilstone. The new drama is by Mr. W. Travers, and is entitled "The Last-Cross Penny." The plot is, of course, sensational. There is the abduction of an infant, the villainous Jew, the wicked uncle, and the virtuous nephew, a number of disreputable characters. The heroine, who grows up as a fisherman's daughter, is of course persecuted by the unscrupulous old rascal, but she is rescued from all her perils, and her mother is again blessed with the presence of her innocent child. Such is the "plain piece of work" altogether ; but in the end the virtuous are triumphant.

SCIENTIFIC NEWS.

M. Steinheil, of Munich, has produced a new photographic objective, which he names "periscope," by which M. Albert, photographer to the King of Bavaria, has obtained pictures of 1 m. 20 c. in diameter, in the Munich. The proof, measuring 30 in., has excited the astonishment of connoisseurs by the purity of its outlines and details.

We learn (by the Athenæum) that Mr. Warren De La Rue has taken a number of photographs of the solar disc, with the view of the sun itself, the atmosphere having been exceedingly clear. By associating the new images with one of the series taken in 1861, he has got the effect of stereoscopic effect. The bulging hemisphere appears almost transparent compared to the flat appearance of the surface of the sun.

M. Boussingault has reported to the Academy of Sciences at Paris the results of his investigations on the nutritive properties of the fonctions of the leaves of plants. He considers that the vegetable cell offers a resistance to the passage of gases, which is, however, considerably diminishable by drying revive on the application of moisture, while the resistance with wet cells remains unaltered. Hence arises the law of vital existence; its death is not the suspension, but the absence, of life. His theory is based on the fact that the leaves of plants, when dry, do not asphyxia.

M. Schwabe has observed in the sun a species of facula remarkable for its dimensions, splendour, and permanence. It is traversing Paris some months, and is visible to the naked eye, as a luminous ring, 40 or seven in number, are so seven minutes in diameter. M. Schwabe attaches considerable importance to the observation of this phenomenon, as a solution of the sun by which the duration of its rotation may be more exactly determined.

A new method of preserving meat in a fresh state has been announced by M. Fleitmann. It consists in treating a concentrated solution of chloride of zinc with a little sulphuret of sodium, and evaporating the compound until it is reduced to the consistency of a paste.

The results of M. Tschernioff's experiments made upon fowls, with the view of determining the relations between the quantity of glycogen in the liver and the duration of muscular activity, have been reported to the Academy of Sciences at Vienna. Hydrocyanic fowls, abundantly consumed, greatly increase the quantity of glycogen in the liver, and the muscular force is augmented. Fowls fed on starch, sugar, and gum, have their liver diminished, and consequently constantly produced livers surcharged with fat, even in the case of starch and sugar, which are the best for the production of glycogen. It would appear that the liver both forms and consumes fatty substances and glycogen, and that abundant feeding or sugar retards this consumption and favours deposition.

Throughout November Venus (in Virgo and Libra) will be a morning star, and Mercury (in Libra, Scorpio, and Sagittarius) and Jupiter (in Libra and Scorpio) will be evening stars. On Nov. 11, Venus will rise at 4h. 57m., a.m.; Mars will pass the meridian at 11h. 49m., a.m.; Jupiter will set at 4h. 19m., p.m.; Saturn will pass the meridian at 10h. 39m., and Uranus will pass the meridian at 9h. 35m., a.m. The Moon's changes will be—Full Moon, Nov. 3, at 6h. 9m., a.m.; Last Quarter, Nov. 10, at 6h. 49m., a.m.; New Moon; Nov. 18, at 11h., a.m.; and First Quarter, Nov. 26, at 6h. 39m., a.m. The conjunction of Mercury and Saturn will be on the meridian about midnight in the middle of the month.

Professor Poluta, of Kharkoff, South Russia, has studied the duration of the life of fishes out of water, which, as is well known, differs in many species. Thus the sturgeon in this position will live several hours ; the carp, a little less ; but the herring perishes in about a minute. This duration is also affected by cutting off the head with the gills, but depends principally upon the quantity of blood in the animal's frame, which, when in close proximity with the quantity of oxygen necessary for its existence. The sturgeon and pike will live longer than the herring ; but the herring dies quickly if the water be not frequently changed. The circumstances favourable to the prolongation of the life of fishes out of water are the epithelial form of the body, the presence of water in the bronchial tubes, and the absence of scales on the skin.

Mr. James Glaisher has transmitted to the Academy of Sciences at Philadelphia the continuation of his observations on the colours of stars and, in connection with the same subject, at the request of science, within the last few years the colour of Sirius has changed from red to white, from white to green, yellow, red, and back to green ; and that of Arcturus has varied from red to yellow and orange. Mr. Glaisher has endeavoured to trace these changes to be due to influence of the earth's atmosphere, to the optical instruments employed, or to peculiarities of the eye of the observer. He observed that Aldebaran, Rigel, and Capella, stars of the first magnitude, the former green and the latter blue, but not sufficiently so to be called green, showed no atmospheric effect on their colours, as mentioned by Humboldt. Mr. Ennis suggests the recording of the colours of stars by the Greenwich photometer, which, on repeating the observations, would draw the attention being paid to the state of the atmosphere and the influence of the sun and moon.

Baron von Reichenbach has communicated to the Academy of Science of Vienna some curious facts concerning certain new persons perceived by the physical agent discovered by him, and denominated "od," in addition to those which he previously published in his "Researches on Magnetism, Electricity, Heat, Light, and Crystallisation, in their Relations to the Vital Force." Among them the following is one of the Baron's recent experiments. Persons of various ages were ranged from another in the passage of the Baron's house, in the open air, and the persons, and the crowd, unequally luminous, took up a state of propriety indispensable to produce a general negative aspect. When an attempt was made to interrupt the fluorescent jets by diverse substances they traversed persons substances less easily opposed to the light. The luminous aspect was noted, the phenomena divided, and the more luminous rays traversed the glass. This is the statement of the Baron in his own words. It is remarked that these luminous phenomena are visible to a small number of persons only, who, in the dark, perceive a luminous aspect of the ends, or points, of the fingers, &c., of the dark.

The new number of the Anthropological Review opens with a paper entitled "Race in History," in which the writer examines the principles embodied in the "Philosophy of Civilisation," and the "Philosophy of the Intellectual Development of Europe," and endeavours to show that the characteristics of race are to be found in the physical rather than the moral geography—the science of man. In the same number will be found resumés of the papers read at the Meeting of the Ethnological Society, and Dr. Conolly's "Prehistoric Annals of Scotland." Mr. Thomas's paper "On Western Rhinoceros" (read before the society) contains a number of facts relative to the existing race of the two-horned species, whether still to be found in the jungles of the Purla Anthropological Society, containing remarks "On the Position of Mankind in the Order of Creation," followed by a discussion "On the Asiatic Origin of Europeans" and "The Ethnic Elements of Europe."

Dr. Aitchison, in the Journal of the Asiatic Society of Bengal, gives an interesting account of the visits of the Kuki tribes, and a sketch of the history of the formation of one of these islands. In September, 1861, a shock of earthquake was experienced, which appears, from what we have become aware, and bare and barren. As the winds blew they carry clouds of the seed of the forest trees, which germinate from other islands ; and the soil, and really germinate. In a couple of months the S. spontaneous has risen up, and, in the course of a few years, the soil will be covered with a jungle, which, having ripened, are lying about at the mercy of the winds. THE LATE PREMIER.

ARRANGEMENTS had been made to inter the remains of Lord Palmerston at Romsey, on Wednesday last, but they were set aside, and the body of the great Minister was yesterday laid in Westminster Abbey. This alteration in the original plan is stated to have been made by "a special desire of the Queen." No doubt it was the national wish that he should find his last resting-place by the side of Canning and Pitt, of England's greatest men. Our town edition will contain some particulars of the ceremony, and in next week's Number illustrations of it we hope to be given. His Lordship's remains were removed, on Monday to Cambridge House. In the funeral there was no esten-tatious display; a four-horse hearse took the body to the railway station, the sole procession. Unpretending, however, as was the display, the country people who met the corpse evidently knew its meaning, for, as it passed, there was a general reverence for the great man, and the little towns and villages, as Hatfield, Potter's Bar, Barnet, Whetstone, and Finchley, through which the train passed, closed, all the churches tolled, and the inhabitants showed the utmost respect. The funeral train started shortly before the hour of eleven o'clock in the morning, and arrived in London at the fall of the day, thus escaping all notice; and when the body arrived at Cambridge House it was found that so privately had the matter been managed, that there were not half a dozen persons present in the house. The body was received there by the only nephew and by the private secretary of his late Lordship, the Rev. Henry Sulivan, and the Hon. Evelyn Ashley. It was carried into the dining-room, where, covered with a pall, and with a plume of feathers at the head, it remained until Friday.

ROYAL SYMPATHY.

The Queen, when the news of the decease of her First Minister was conveyed to her, instantly wrote, by General Grey, expressing her concern and requesting to be kept informed of Parliament's action; and when the worst intelligence reached Balmoral she wrote to assure the Premier of her "heartfelt and deep sympathy in the loss which is this deep trial." The Prince and Princess of Wales also telegraphed anxiously and repeatedly to Brocket Hall for news during the attack and the subsequent relapse to their great sorrow at its fatal issue.

The Emperor and Empress of the French, the King of Italy, and the King of the Belgians have expressed their sympathy with Her and Lady Palmerston under her bereavement.

The following is a translation of the despatch in which the French Minister of Foreign Affairs requested the Baron Baude to transmit to Earl Russell the regret felt by the Emperor and Empress on account of the death of the Premier :—

The Minister of Foreign Affairs to Baron Baude, Chargé d'Affaires of France in London.

Monsieur,—The Emperor and his Government could not, without a deep sentiment of regret, witness the disappearance from the political scene of the illustrious statesman who has for so long a time occupied the first rank, and has painfully moved public opinion in the country which he served for long years with so much distinction. It will not be necessary for me to dwell on what is known. For ourselves, Monsieur, we have in many important circumstances had the opportunity of appreciating all the noble qualities which Lord Palmerston was endowed, and we shall always love to remember how much he contributed to the establishment of the relations of sincere and friendly ship which, from the beginning of the Second Empire, have existed between France and England.

Lord Palmerston was the first, in the month of December, 1852, to receive from the Emperor the assurances and resolutions which the situation of France imposed on his Majesty. His loyalty commanded confidence, and he himself set above the resentments of the past with a freedom of judgment so much the more worthy of praise that at the opening of his career he had been connected with the ancient order. He used his influence to bring to the consummation of his labour sentiments the expression of which was dear to Europe by the events accomplished in France.

It was under the auspices of Lord Palmerston the most decided and certain assistance when the complications which occurred in the East called on the two nations to unite in their efforts, and the Emperor cannot think alliance not less remarkable by the intimate and loyal agreement of the views than by the noble results which it has obtained.

Nor should we forget the peaceful solution of the Neuchâtel question, which the firmness of Lord Palmerston enabled five years ago. As First Minister of the Queen he had emphatically supported the cause of the maintenance of the relations of England with us by giving them for base a stricter solidarity of mutual interests. He showed himself ever the faithful representative of the liberal system, henceforth consecrated by experience and adopted to-day by the majority of the States of the Continent.

These acts belong to the history of the two countries. The name of Lord Palmerston will remain attached to it, and it is the duty of the Government of the power which he placed in conjunctures of so great an interest for the existence of France and England. We make it a duty to express the feelings of our sympathies to the honours which the British nation so justly renders to his memory. I beg of you to be kind enough to bring this letter to the attention of the Emperor and the Government of the Queen. You will be good enough to read it to the chief of the Principal Secretary of State of the Queen a copy of this despatch.

DROUYN DE LHUYS.

TRIBUTES OF RESPECT BY PUBLIC MEN.

In nearly all the metropolitan churches and chapels on Sunday allusion was made by the preachers to the great career of Lord Palmerston, and the loss the country has sustained by his death. All the leading daily and weekly journals have had articles on his death; and sermons from all parts of the country show that the sense of the loss Great Britain has sustained, more or all shades of political opinion is about to be consigned to the sepulchre of Westminster.

THE BISHOP OF SALISBURY ON LORD PALMERSTON.

On Thursday week a meeting of the inhabitants of Salisbury and the neighbourhood was held in the Council Chamber, for the purpose of giving to inaugurate a local school of science and art in connection with the Government Department of Science and Art. The Bishop of Salisbury presided, and in opening the proceedings, Lord Radnor referred to the death of the late Premier :—

He was sure he should not do justice either to his own feelings or to theirs if, in mentioning the Government of this country and the aid which they were prepared to give to that or any other good work, he did not allude to the opportunity to express, on their part and his own, their deep sense of the loss which this country had sustained in the death of the late Prime Minister (Hear, hear). The name of Lord Palmerston, whatever differences of opinion might exist as to the line of policy he had pursued, was a name of many a year with our prosperity, both at home and abroad (Hear, hear, and applause); and therefore, though he was not going to dilate further upon that subject, he felt it would be unbecoming in him if he did not make sure, entire to his own feelings and to theirs if he did not remind them of the loss that they had lost the morning before yesterday—a loss which probably owed these advantages which they were about to avail themselves of in connection with the Science and Art Department (Hear, hear).

LORD HOUGHTON AND LORD P. CAVENDISH.

Lord Houghton, in a speech at the closing ceremony of an exhibition in Wakefield, on Thursday week, referred to the death of the late Premier as follows :—

But perhaps it may be said that the life which ended yesterday is a signal instance to every one of us of what may be done in this country by a man who sets the noblest course of his life to the accomplishment of his duty, and pays no disappointment to check him; who allows no failure to damp him; but who goes on persistently in the course which he has chosen for himself, and attains that high summit of success he aimed at. In the life of Lord Palmerston, which yesterday closed, we may see a signal proof of the fact that cultivation of his talents, and the application of his talents to the test of purpose, and to the best of purposes, will lead a man to a career of honour and distinction, and to a name loved and honoured by his country long after the tongue is silenced that gave it utterance (Hear, hear). That great useful life, that illustrious life which has closed, has cast a ray of glory over the institutions of this country place in England to-day and for some days to come. It will last for longer than the occupation of this exhibition—it will last as long as the language lasts, as long as the history of the world is known (Loud applause).

At a meeting at the inauguration of the Working Men's Club and Institute at Garforth, near Leeds, Lord Houghton and Lord P. Cavendish addressed the meeting. Lord Houghton, at the close of his address, said :—

He could not help remembering that almost the last time on which he was present in an institutions something of this nature that he was in the company of that great man who, if he had lived to that day, would have attained his eighty-first year, and who had passed away from us in the fullness of years and honour—a man who had felt throughout this country in a manner which was most sensible to the hearts and feelings of Englishmen. All political opposition seemed, as it were, in abeyance. Nobody seemed to care at this moment whether he was a Whig or a Tory. There was nothing but one general mean of regret, as it were, for the loss of the great man who had so fully represented the intellect and heart of England (Hear, hear). The great interest which Lord Palmerston took in institutions of this kind was well known. Many would remember his cheerful demeanour at Leeds some years ago, so that when he kept in the streets saw his pleasant and affable manner, they little thought that that was the man who ruled the destinies of England, and to a certain degree, the destinies of the world. Many would remember the kind and sensible remarks he made upon institutions of this kind, and the excellent speech he delivered on that occasion. He (Lord Houghton) could say, from having seen Lord Palmerston in his own home, how kind he was to his own peasantry and to all those connected with his estates—how great an interest he took in all their private affairs, in the happiness of their families, and in the education of their children. He was sure that every one of the Manchester institutions had experienced the kindness and care of Lord Palmerston which had caused their sympathy to rise out of the whole of England (Hear, hear). He was sure that the Mechanics' Institution here, which had caused the feeling that they had lost in him something almost in a private relation no less than in the public one to mourn his loss (Applause).

Lord F. Cavendish said :—

He was sure that every one present shared in the loss of her great statesman. It was difficult to think of anything else. He said when all England mourned. He was sure that every one present would sympathise with the Queen, and every Englishman felt he had suffered a personal grief (Hear). They felt that their Queen had lost a friend, and a friend of the first water at the helm, the interests and honour of England were safe (Hear, hear).

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

On Thursday week Sir Fitzroy Kelly, M.P., being at a public dinner at Ipswich, took occasion, in the course of a speech, to refer in the following terms to the death of Lord Palmerston :—

This is a great national calamity, of which every man, let him belong to what party he may, if he be an Englishman, will deeply have to admire to it, may speak as in itself a great and lasting national calamity. It was my good fortune during the existence of the late Ministry to be associated in the illustrious individual who has now passed away from among us, and that the more I belonged to the same political party, as himself; and I must say that the habitudes of Ipswich afforded me the opportunity of appearing with him in public, and I must say that I never encountered a man who, as he was my colleague, so that none could more entirely succeed to his political opinions, and so be constituent unit the latest moments of his life. I say, Mr. Mayor, that the illustrious statesman who has left his long and illustrious career, whether from his partisans and friends in the Cabinet, in the House of Commons, or by people throughout the land he was so distinguished an ornament, or whether from those who had the misfortune to be opposed to him, was regarded with respect and with affection, naturally divide the great and intelligent among men, I never heard but one opinion of the illustrious statesman which made the whole of his career. As to his patriotism, as to his disinterestedness, as to the deep love and attachment he had for the institutions of his country, as to the high honour which he had for, to the last, the honour and dignity of the Crown which he had been opposed to him now for thirty years and more, from the hour when I was first returned to Parliament, I never heard a single word but what was consistently and sincerely, that, although I have been opposed to him in politics, I have been proud to call him my friend, and that I have always looked up to him as a model and a pattern to all English gentlemen; and I believe that he had no political opponent who did not look on him in equal behalf (Cheers). I will not detain you longer upon so melancholy a subject than to say that I am sure that every one here will feel that it will be my duty or province to speak of him at all, that during the many, many years I possessed, I may now to take a part in public life, I never saw a man acquainted with him in public or in private life, he never lost a friend and never made an enemy (Loud cheers).

SIR ARCHIBALD ALISON.

Before proceeding with the Lord Provost's late court at Glasgow, on Thursday week, Sir Archibald Alison referred thus to the death of Lord Palmerston :—

It does not belong to this place, or to ally of us, to attempt to pronounce a fitting eulogium on that illustrious man. That will be better done by his own countrymen, when the first sorrow for his loss is over. But I feel it to be an sinner him expressing the feelings of this great community, that in the death of Lord Palmerston we have sustained a national loss, and deplore the departure from among us of one who for upwards of half a century has filled Lord Palmerston united. In him we admired alike profound wisdom, prudence in counsel, and valour in action, firmness in difficulty, moderation in success, fixity of purpose, and courtesy of manner—all of which are essential qualities in a statesman. Above all, we admired his patriotism and ardent and unextinguishable love for his country—that was the pole-star of his life. It was that which guided him in the calculations of his policy, and the object to whom he served, but generally so as to meet the approval of the country which he served. He was emphatically a man of the people, and the people of Scotland, as well as England, have reason to be proud of the name of Lord Palmerston's voice, there will be but one feeling of regret that that great statesman has been taken from us at the moment when his services were so much needed, and another great man who died some years ago, and with whom he long wrought side by side, Lord Wellington, died with honour on his back, serving his country to the last moment of his life.

MR. ADAM BLACK.

At a public dinner at Edinburgh, which took place on Wednesday week, Mr. Adam Black, late M.P. for Edinburgh, in giving the toast of "The Queen," observed that he had no desire to preface it by any words regarding the melancholy intelligence which they had that evening heard :—

A great man had fallen in Britain this day. Perhaps there is no one at this table who has had so much intercourse with him as I have had, and the kindness which he showed to me during the time I was always treated by him with the greatest kindness and consideration. He was remarkable for his intelligence, his sincere intentions, and his excellent qualities. I have known him to sit in the House of Commons for a week together, and in the Commons at four o'clock in the day and sit down to attend to the business of the country, when he was on a point that not even for his own party would he do that which was to be an injury to his country ("Hear!" and applause). He was not only conducted himself in a manner which was to be a credit to the country, but he showed a great deal more confidence in him than in their own leaders (Laughter and applause), for they knew he was a man who would not betray them. He would not willingly do that which was to be an injury to his country ("Hear!" and applause). The country showed a great deal more confidence in him, and he is dead to us the vote they should give, they always gave the benefit of that doubt to him (Laughter and applause). He never formed a Ministry without having some reflections on him, for having changed his opinions from time to time. He (Mr. Black) recollected that in 1852 he was in the House of Commons, and, if he recollected right, Lord Palmerston was then Minister, and he was talked about and save the vessel ("Hear!" and laughter.) He never formed such a Ministry without having some reflections on him, for having changed from them; and, when circumstance changed in such a way that it was absolutely necessary that he should do so, he changed his opinions (Laughter and applause). In his object ever was to promote the best interests of the country, and the country knew and appreciated his services. He was a great statesman, for the best, good feeling, and prudence once which he has always displayed (Applause). He was a man of thoroughly independent spirit, he never was in any party that had a more sound practical sense of the course which ought to be pursued than he had. He was a thoroughly honest man, and he was a man who would not do that which was to be an injury to his country (Applause). He was a man who would not do that which was to be an injury to his country (Applause). He was a man who would not do that which was to be an injury to his country (Applause). He was a man who would not do that which was to be an injury to his country (Applause).

MR. DU CANE, MR. HERON, AND MR. MILLER.

At a meeting at Colchester, yesterday week, Mr. Du Cane, M.P., observed :—

He was sure there was no one present, whatever might be his political opinions, who would not cordially coincide in the remark that the death of Lord Palmerston was a very grave political event at the present moment, and brought with the gravest political import as regarded the future. He had never been, as they knew, an implicit admirer of Lord Palmerston's policy, and indeed had been, for the most part, his consistent opponent; but he had ever admired his thoroughly English and manly character, and had ever been a ready testimony to the consummate tact with which, in a moment of great difficulty, he instilled his party towards moderate councils, and gained an ascendancy over the House of Commons and over the British nation that has, perhaps, never been equalled by any Minister since the days of Pericles (Hear, hear). In the presence of death the voice of detraction stood mostly hushed, and the present was not the time to speculate on the influence this event might have on the course of political affairs. He would, therefore, ask them to join with him in declaring that in the death of Lord Palmerston this nation had lost a truly national leader, a truly national and thorough Englishman—a man whom we could ill spare at the present moment—and that we deeply deplored it.

Mr. Rebow, M.P., said :—

They must all have spoken the death of Lord Palmerston as not only a national but a European and a world-wide loss, for probably on his policy depended the future peace and tranquillity of the civilised world (Hear, hear). He had died at the top of the tide of his popularity, and he had had the gratification of knowing that he had left the British nation high and honourable and supported the policy which he had advocated as the best and most propitious for this nation (Hear, hear).

Mr. Miller, M.P., remarked :—

He could only express the deep regret and sorrow to the loss which this country had sustained in the death of Lord Palmerston—a loss which it had been well said would be felt not only in England, but throughout the world, and would be deeply mourned by millions beyond our shores. As long as Lord Palmerston lived there was a man in the House of Commons who enjoyed universal respect and exercised a universal influence. Whatever he undertook was always carried by a large majority, and on large purpose was he generally received with excess because it was always appreciated by both friends and foes (Hear, hear).

ADDRESSES OF CONDOLENCE TO LADY PALMERSTON.

Most of the meetings of the various boards throughout the kingdom have sent, or are about forthwith to send, addresses of condolence to Lady Palmerston.

The inhabitants of Tiverton, which Lord Palmerston represented for thirty years, assembled in the Town Hall on Saturday, and moved an address of condolence and sympathy to Lady Palmerston. Mr. Cash, Deputy Mayor, presided, and amongst those present were J. Walker (Mayor), Rev. J. Bere (Tiverton), T. Dyke Acland, Esq., M.P. for North Devon; F. Hole, Esq., chairman of the late Lord Palmerston's committee, and the principal Liberal gentlemen of the district. Mr. Walrond proposed, in suitable terms, the following address to Lady Palmerston :—

We, the inhabitants of the borough of Tiverton, beg to offer to your Ladyship our sincere condolence and sympathy on the heavy loss you have sustained by the death of your noble husband, our much-beloved and highly esteemed representative, the late Lord Palmerston. We feel that in his untiring zeal which he spent in the service of his country and his long connection with this borough, he has endeared himself to us, and have implanted him in his death we sustain a severe and irreparable loss. But, while we mourn the decease of one who has been taken from us full of years and in valuable labours, we cannot but express our great admiration of his surpassing judgment, his high statesmanship, his unbounded patriotism, and his unwearied devotion to the best interests of his country, and we feel that your Ladyship's personal sorrow can in any degree be alleviated, it will be by the knowledge that the blessings of the whole British nation, and especially of this particular, share in the deep and undying regret which must follow the death of such a man as he was.

The address was seconded by Mr. Hole, and adopted. It was resolved that the shops should be suspended and the blinds of private houses kept down on the morning of the funeral.

A meeting of the inhabitants of Romsey was held, on Thursday week, for the purpose of giving expression to the deep sorrow which the death of Lord Palmerston has caused throughout the town and neighbourhood, and to the sincere sympathy which is felt for Lady Palmerston in her bereavement. The deputy Mayor (Mr. Purchase) presided, and there was a numerous attendance of the leading residents of the town of Romsey and of the parish of Romsey-extra, as well as of the surrounding villages. The following address to Lady Palmerston, from Mr. W. F. Cowper was unanimously adopted :—

We, the undersigned, have been invited upon this day to preside at a public meeting of the inhabitants of Romsey, without any deputation, and I am sure that I express the feeling of every gentleman in saying to my Lady Palmerston, at the earliest fitting opportunity, the sense of the profound and heartfelt sorrow which pervades the whole of this neighbourhood. We feel that no formal way was the birthplace of that great man, whose noble and active career is now so sadly and suddenly terminated. We entertained remembrance of his good and kind deeds he has for such a long time done among us, we may venture that to express the sympathy and sorrow which we entertained for your sad condolence of the municipal body, convey to her Ladyship, through your kind mediation, our deep sympathy in her sad bereavement.

W. G. PURCHASE, ex-Mayor of Romsey.

COMMENTS OF THE CONTINENTAL PRESS.

The following remarks on Lord Palmerston's career and death are gathered from the Continental journals :—

The Journal des Débats says :—

Entering public life at a very early age, in the beginning of the century, he had become since count for a great part in the affairs of his country. We shall subsequently consider in a special article this long political career—remarkable, indeed, for its consistency, and which has been crowned by a most pleasant, but inevitable, end. In the meantime, we will only say that the acts of the late Premier have been the constant speaking of the remarkable talents of the deceased statesman. Lord Palmerston was, perhaps, the last monarch among his countrymen; and certainly if anything in the world ever could have made the monarchical regret expressed this morning by the English press, upon this point a very faithful echo of public opinion. We at least are not singular in considering the death of Lord Palmerston as having nearly served its time, and as no longer responding to the ideas and wants of the present day; but, in order to be able correctly to understand the minister possessed that of being pre-eminently English. He was English from his heart, his instinct and his personal character. He was English in his qualities, and one ought to add, to the praise of our neighbours, that similar temperaments are not wanting among them.

The Roman Catholic Mercure states :—

The death of Lord Palmerston is a great event. His influence, his experience, and his plasticity of mind rendered him a figure worthy to be examined. His character, his genius, and his career are subjects which would be a complete history of England during the last thirty years. It is not the moment for such a work. Lord Palmerston has left behind him a name which deserves still more attentive examination, and which may explain more than one apparently illogical act. Lord Palmerston was, above all, a man of his time. He was a European freemason. The part played by England in the matter of the Italian revolution, and the sympathy which it found in the hearts of freemasons of all. The official reception given to Garibaldi—a reception which has left such a deep trace in the memory of the Italian revolutionists—and the visit of the Cabinet of St. James's under the same circumstances, prove very soon the existence of a secret understanding. Lord Palmerston knew how to keep his secret, and he knew how to keep it well. The official acts must not be the only ones to be regarded with importance by the historians of Lord Palmerston.

In the Opinion Nationale we read :—

A grand figure has just left the world's stage. Lord Palmerston is dead. Having lived to the age of eighty-one years, his death at this he has never ceased to occupy, either in power or in opposition, a considerable place in the public mind, and his name, by its popularity and vigour, has kept him in the front rank of contemporary statesmen. Lord Palmerston, in fact, combined, in the highest degree, the qualities and the defects of his country, which both of them belonged to him one of the most typical examples of the English character. Latterly, every turnover, every discussion caused around his name, and the sympathy which was shown for him grew out of them. His death will probably be the signal for a new classification of parties, and if the testing of the future is not to prove to be a time of reactionary institutions, and especially electoral reform, are likely to demand a large share of attention. The most remarkable event in the career of Lord Palmerston will announce his death without paying a last tribute of respect to the eminent statesman who has so long represented the constitutional principle which is known in history as one of the accomplished types of an English gentleman and statesman.

The Patrie remarks :—

England has just lost her ablest Minister, her greatest statesman since Fox and Pitt. Lord Palmerston died yesterday. It is the most fitting time to pronounce his eulogium. The political career of the deceased Sir Robert Peel his policy was closely marked. Lord Palmerston carries with him the secret of a policy which we may criticise, but which, it must be confessed, has often been the strength, the resource of Great Britain. He is, too, however, by his acts than by the prestige of his name, his long experience, and his relations with all the leading men of the age, that Lord Palmerston was a power for his country.

The Nord states :—

Lord Palmerston was more than the chief of a party, more than an able Minister; he was a national illustration of which the English people, Con-severities as well as Liberals, were grand; and before his tomb the dissensions of parties must be silent to make way for a universal mourning. The impression produced by the death of the First Lord of the Treasury will be so much the more profound as his popularity was increasing. . . . All other items disappear before this death, which will for a long time absorb public attention.

The Press says:—

"One of the greatest personages of our age has just disappeared from the political scene. Lord Palmerston is dead. It is impossible for those at present the intimates which this end event will have upon the policy of England and the solution of questions which concern the peace of Europe.

He was one of the most perfect and large-minded of political gentlemen. He was the incarnation of the spirit of the English aristocracy in its best nature. He felt in his breast all the thrills of European diplomacy, and he was at one escape him by chance or without a purpose. . . . The loss which England has sustained is immense. With Lord Palmerston has disappeared the last representative of the political men, the contemporaries of the Republic and the first Empire." . . . In attributing to Lord Palmerston a personal acquaintance with the Emperor Napoleon the speedy recognition by the English Government of the coup d'état, and at the same time encouraging that act as a great service to humanity, and an opportune check to demagogueism, the Siècle, La Presse continues:—"Lord Palmerston, in his relations with France, Lord Palmerston appeared to be alternately actuated by the most contradictory sentiments. Sometimes he showed himself a cordial understanding; but the impression left by his very political acts often made him stand aloof. Hence a see-saw policy and incoherent action which frequently set unaccountable.

The Constitutionnel publishes the following remarks :—

The death of Lord Palmerston is a public calamity for England. The statesman who has just ceased to live was the glory of his country. The statesman who has just ceased to live was the glory of his country. His domestic and foreign policy of Great Britain, and he was, at an extremely advanced age, remarkable by possession of all his energies and all his influence, that his disappearance from the scene is really an event. For a statesman, old age, if only physical, is a source of weakness and prestige: the more life leaves increase the younger is his popularity. This is what happened with Lord Palmerston. As he became older he became more popular. He was the last luminaries of distinct of public opinion that took from him the portfolio of Premier—a few months ago—he brought to resume it, and when the Queen, Simeon of old; he was surrounded in his eighty-first year with respect and confidence, and seemed to recognise at once the signs of the times and the wishes of those which he might still render. It is not now the moment to pass judgment upon the political life of Lord Palmerston. Its most important phases are still too distinct in their political life, which has been so long and so brilliant, that it could not be written without drawing on almost complete picture of contemporary history. Nor is it the moment to speak of his personal character. Over his grave we would only remember the readiness shown by the noble Lord in to recognise the new order of things which arose in France and France with the great name of Napoleon. We only desire to remember the policy from which arose the treaty of commerce, and to which we owe the conformity of the soldiers of France and England upon the battle-fields of the Crimea, and the events of China. The noble Lord has, therefore, enjoyed during thirty years, and the immense regret with which his loss inspires his countrymen, are naturally mingled with sentiments which his principal virtue was love for his country. Whether his conceptions were always right or not, he was at least sincere in his patriotism. Whether rightly or wrongly the allies, the alliances which he formed or broke were always guided by his British patriotism. Let us be careful not to reproach him with it. Whether let us admire him for it, and endeavour to imitate him. Let us be Frenchmen as Lord Palmerston was an Englishman.

The Courrier du Dimanche says:—

The part of Lord Palmerston even in England has not been an important as his name. Whig, which once any great object had been carried out with success, and he felt himself called upon to take the lead in the new policy rather than the conservative mind, he did not hesitate to abandon his old colleagues and his own party. An enemy of absolute forms, he unceasingly endeavoured to make compromises between the more or less advanced opinions of the Liberal Conservatives, who sent him to the house and supported him, sometimes in power, sometimes in the ranks of the opposition. He was always, in a word, more exactly, this absence of principles, which detracts from his character, was of great value in his foreign policy, which constantly aimed at being the first place in that department. The inconsequence of this line of conduct is evident. The established Belgian neutrality, which was always declared to be revolutionary in Italy and reactionary elsewhere; but in all matters he always kept the first place for the interests of England, and he succeeded, especially English, he did not fear to raise the question of peace or war for the sake of maintaining the balance of power in Europe. He was the author of the famous declaration in 1840 and that of 1850 which saved Turkey and Greece from the miserable Pritchard affair, and the riskiness indemnity of 37,000 claimed by the Portuguese Jew Pacifico. He always showed himself inexorable in the principles for allowing his country to play a part. For this reason he was often attacked in France, where we have never understood the opposition which in England, on the contrary, Lord Palmerston has almost always been popular, and he was with perfect right so. His good humour he called the electors his "dear friends." Quick to perceive the direction in which the current of public opinion was flowing, he never let it time rather slowly, rarely anticipated it, never attempted to turn it aside. He was essentially a man of the present. He had not the imaginous phenomena which can only be understood in a country thoroughly moral sciences, where means are found to preach the truth to the people and to make special speculations which succeed.

In the Espoir M. Edouard Hervé devotes six columns to the career of the veteran statesman :—

The noble Lord (he says) has died in the full enjoyment of his influence and his popularity. Happier than Walpole or Lord Chatham, he has died before age or infirmity had impaired his health or his faculties. He has died as he died the Premier and Leader of the House of Commons—that is to say, in the full exercise of his power. He has died, in fact, at the moment when he was about to die—at the moment when he was about to resign. He has died at the moment when he was about to decline—at the moment when possibly events were at hand which it would have been beyond his power to control. The glory of the noble Lord's biography is beyond our limits. It would be requisite to write the history of England—indeed of Europe—during the last sixty years. . . . For more than sixty years since Lord Palmerston entered public life, and he has mixed up with all the great political events of our time. . . . He has been connected with all the ideas, all the passions of England. He has borne his share of her successes and her reverses; and the great qualities which have made the power and humanity and civilisation shed some of their lustre upon him. It is that constant participation in the public life of his country which makes his memory defective as it was in many respects—a certain grandeur. We may say it, without fear of being accused of flattery, that Lord Palmerston was one of the great qualities of a statesman; he was a great minister, and we associate him in the same degree as some of his predecessors or contemporaries.

We read in La Presse :—

The old spirit of England will be buried in Lord Palmerston's tomb, and the hour of democracy will soon strike in Liberal England. The statesman who would succeed to the heritage of Palmerston must have the courage to become the Robert Peel of universal suffrage.

The Armée National says :—

He was very indifferent to the great movements which troubled other countries, and saluted the Republic of 1848 and the coup-d'état of 1851 with supernatural.

Independance Belge says :—

A man who has played a grand rôle in the history of his country and of the world dies gloriously. Lord Palmerston's name will remain illustrious. It will be more. His loss will be regarded as a public calamity. The calculations, expedience, and the habitual moderation of Lord Palmerston in confronting, sometimes with a levity more apparent than real, difficulties and dangers from which other statesmen would have recoiled, were calculated to favour the fluctuations of public opinion and to follow them when the interests of England or those of the general tranquillity of Europe and equilibrium which during a long political career made Lord Palmerston the most popular man in England, and rendered his name one of the most widely known and considered in the balance of political forces and transformation which England, and Europe with her, is traversing at this moment.

The Breed of Berne has the following :—

Palmerston was the type of the resolutions and deficiencies of the English people, and therefore admired and loved by his countrymen. He understood how to prefer the step of the State-ship to the rocks, to circumvent the most dangerous, and always to maintain for himself the reputation of the most skilful pilot. Without being a great orator, he was a great leader. He knew how to meddle with foreigners, the interests of which he always made those of the opponent of Continental absolutism. Of late years, notably since 1851, he had not only completely regenerated the foreign relations of England, but finally weakened her political influences in Europe. Switzerland, however, will never forget the active part taken by the noble Lord in her affairs during his happier days.

The Deutsche Allgemeine Zeitung speaks of the deceased statesman in the following terms :—

He was undoubtedly an extremely able and acute diplomatist; but for a truly great statesman he was wanting in lofty conceptions, in firm moral elevations, in true enthusiasm for great and imperishable principles of the rights of states and nations. His policy was therefore often bold, even adventurous, but not always expressive, consistent, and worthy of a great Power like England, and a nation like the English. The almost unlimited omnipotence he had achieved for the Ministry, and especially for himself, in foreign politics, and which he was usually able to defend with success against the attempts of Parliamentary interference, has assuredly often been disadvantageous, and it will be good in this respect that the English people, and particularly the Parliament, will now be able to take a more active part in the direction of the political relation of the State. As regards the special foreign relations of England, the Napoleon alliance loses its great support in England, and Germany—particularly upon the question of expansion towards the sea—her most obstinate opponent. It was he who in 1848 contributed much towards the failure of the Schleswig-Holstein agitation, and thereby to the shipwreck of the whole German movement; but, in return, experienced in 1864 the righteous retribution of being forced to abandon Denmark, when he had encouraged her to resistance, and to rely on the help of the Western Powers. Lord Palmerston was the last of that school of English statesmen which had gone through the whole campaign against Napoleon. His name will ever remain inseparably connected with the history of Europe.

The Cologne Gazette devotes two columns of its space to a biography of Lord Palmerston, in which it says :—

If anyone in future time wishes to sketch the portrait of an English statesman he had better take Lord Palmerston for his model. He will possess the good fortune to possess statesmen of reputation as a special class—men who, in spite of their individual peculiarities, are yet true to the type.

Lord Palmerston was the last of that school of English statesmen which Pitt—not the cool calculation of the younger—but the deep seriousness and the supreme statesmanship of the elder Pitt, Canning, Castlereagh and in high a place in oratory as the fiery Canning; nay, they even coincided him as a parliamentary leader with the younger Pitt—with the younger Pitt, indeed, this judgment is probably mainly based upon imperfect delivery and outward effect; otherwise we could only admire the effective tone of the English. Many of his speeches, even those only delivered at an election or a dinner, are real masterpieces, in which every sentence is weighed, every expression full of spirit and humour. Without being a learned man, or an expert, he was a thoroughly educated man, and his wide reading and his inherent humanity so hardly met with in English statesmen, and yet he was a genuine Englishman in mind and manner, and this was no indefinitable in the breeding which he had, and received all the more influence over his nation because he was its genuine type. . . . As regards personal character, he may be called a model. He charmed even his opponents, and, together with his amiable conduct, the English people admired his energy, courage, and his bold spirit of action.

For nearly sixty years that Lord Palmerston has occupied a place in political life he has been mixed up with all the great events of his day. He has been the witness of the most brilliant triumphs and the most terrible reverses of the fortunes, the glory, and the misfortunes of his country. Most striking service he has been able to render to the cause of truth and liberty is that which consists in the example he has given to the world of a political life which makes up the dominant character of his life, and gives him a certain precision in appreciation of men and things. It may be said even upon the morrow of his death that Lord Palmerston lacked some of the superior qualities of those statesmen of the past who have left behind them a higher degree as some of his contemporaries. Cunning had more depth and more finesse; Pitt had more eloquence and more breadth and good sense; the heart of Fox beat with more generous passions; the characters of both the latter were more pure and more consistent. But in the case of these great men—not even, perhaps, the second Pitt—has possessed to the same degree as Lord Palmerston the power of adapting himself to the requirements of the time, the spirit of the moment, which gave him the power of departing from it. Lord Palmerston has changed his opinions upon more than one occasion, but he has never changed his character. He has the absolute position in the world of abstract ideas has varied more than once, but his attitude in the face of the circumstances of the day has never been changed; he has always been at the very fountain head of the great current of opinion, and has always thought like the mind of the entire nation.

The official Journal de Francfort says :—

Lord Palmerston was never a statesman in the highest sense of the word, but he was always a great parliamentary leader. Even when he was Premier he was so thoroughly accustomed to be with the political complexities of the country, the feelings of the House of Commons, the temper of his party, the illusions and of his opponents, the nature of public opinion and that of Parliamentary life, that he was able to direct the course of debates, manœuvre in battles, and he has gained the object he set himself to attain, to achieve which he sometimes had to employ means which, in the hands of less experts, in power to the hour of his death. . . . In the settlement of almost all the questions which have arisen he played a very important and influential part. He raised the power of England for a time to the highest pinnacle it has ever reached, and he was unquestionably the most popular man in England during the civil war—was at the same time his last. Great at were his exertions to prevent the war, but when it broke out he was resolved and there will be many who will say, upon hearing of his death, "He died too late for his fame."

The Debats observes :—

Lord Palmerston was the last-aboard man in England," as he called himself—"Old Pam," as the English people delighted in jokingly styling him—and he was the last of the Ministers who, during the last half century, governed men—a mind of the rarest gifts, a politician upon the most magnificent scale. He was the last of the Ministers who, during the last half century, governed men that we belong to his unconditional admirers and adherents, or that we fear him as a dangerous adversary. Without being either the one or the other, we can only bow before the majestic manner in which he has filled his place in power to the hour of his death. . . . LORD PALMERSTON'S LAST APPEARANCE IN PUBLIC.

The noble Viscount made his last appearance in public on the occasion of Tuesday's meeting of the Council of the Royal Agricultural Society, a contested election in the town—the first which had taken place for a quarter of a century—having been determined upon for that day by the Council. The nomination, which took place on the previous day, was characterised by a speech from the Prime Minister, and a few extracts from the report of which may be here given. The first and last public utterances of a statesman who had been elected to seventeen Parliaments.

After expressing his confidence as to the result of the poll, his Lordship said that for the last twenty-five years he had been honoured by the presidential member of her Majesty's Government. When first the charge of the affairs of the country were entrusted to him, he entered upon it with a deep sense of responsibility, and he was conscious that he had not shrunk from the performance of that duty. They had been relieved from many of its shackles, and wealth had been accumulated in some instances to an almost fabulous extent. The revenue of the country had increased so rapidly that his right hon. friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer had been unable to stop that increase by a great remission of taxes. He had taken off tax after tax—the tea, sugar, and fire insurance duties, and the duty on paper, which was a most vexatious one—and down here and there—but, in spite of all, the country had been deriving a revenue from which a large part of the taxation had been taken off. The alleviation of burdens upon individuals, a noteworthy impression had been made on the public debt, and our public establishments had been maintained in a state of efficiency. They were at peace with all the great Powers of the world, and they had maintained a strict neutrality throughout the afflicting war which had desolated the neighbouring States of North America. They had greatly enlarged the area of commercial enterprise between England and France, and they might depend upon it that one of the best securities for the maintenance of peace between nations was the fact that each had a commercial interest in maintaining peace and friendship with the other. In the negotiation of the French Treaty they were assisted by the late Mr. Cobden, and most honourable and zealous were his exertions to carry into effect the instructions he received from the Cabinet. His colleague, Mr. Gladstone, still occupies a high and responsible office which it was his (Lord Palmerston's) duty to make, on behalf of the Crown, to a man who had rendered such distinguished services. In proclaiming his speech at the nomination, the noble Lord made one of these very witty speeches for which he was famous. I shall again very soon (he said) which I have for so many Parliaments enjoyed, the honour of being one of the representatives of the City of Oxford in Parliament. I shall do so by having as the colleague in the representation the most agent of Philippi"—Philippi being the hustings and polling-booths to answer.

The result of the election was, as we have stated, to place Lord Palmerston at the head of the poll. On the Tuesday the noble Viscount him duly elected one of the members for Tiverton, Lord Palmerston returned home to the family seat of Broadlands and to his rural labours. The noble Viscount said :—

There are one or two reasons why I am not going to make you a long speech. In the first place I am now a member of the House of Commons (Cheers), and there is nothing more hateful in that honourable house than men who abuse the patience of their hearers by making long speeches. Moreover, I am no longer young, and consequently I have no inclination to exert myself to the rain. Therefore, Gentlemen, having yesterday stated at length that which I have to say with regard to the election of Tiverton, I shall confine myself to a few words more. I am grateful for the honour which you have conferred upon me by again electing me as your representative in Parliament. (Loud cheers.) I shall endeavour to do my active exertions to shape my conduct as representative so as to merit and obtain a continuance of that honourable confidence which you have been pleased to repose in me during a period now elapsed (Applause). I thank you, Gentlemen, from the bottom of my heart for the kind manner in which you have received the honour conferred upon me; and I trust—perhaps I may be allowed from past experience to say—that I shall be returned to Parliament again come before the country for the renewal of your trustees, I shall meet with a reception as cordial and satisfactory as that which I have met with on the present occasion (Cheers). God bless you, Gentlemen, I wish well to you all, prosperity to the town, and I hope that you will long continue to inhabit it (Cheers).

LORD PALMERSTON AS AN IRISH LANDLORD.

A correspondent of the Freeman's Journal gives the following picture of the late Viscount as an Irish landlord :—

Lord Palmerston, besides owning some 8000 acres in and around Dublin, owns a large property in Sligo, comprising the entire town of Ballymote, and many building ground, and very large estates in the county of Sligo—one near Ballymote and the larger lower down on the shores of Lough Gill. Mr. Lamberton, the agent for the Sligo property, had to face and overcome at the expiration of the lease on the deaths of William IV. and Queen Victoria. Many of the tenants had been in the habit of paying merely nominal rents. His Lordship, while giving annuities or sixty-one years' leases of moderate rents to the representatives of those tenants, and to the rest of the estate to the sub-tenants at one half or one third of their previous rents, and giving them the fee of their holdings, and giving each tenant his own building. The estate was secured without one ejectment, but willingly and gladly accepting free peasant proprietorship to sell their cattle and grain, their streams of rent freedom, and a sum of money to each tenant to build a house and offices on his own land. At the time when the noble Lord's agent was thus arranging for the sale of passage, his Lordship wrote to the shipowner that he would not allow any of his tenants to be ill-treated on the voyage, and that if there was "his people," the contract should be cancelled, and one made to treat them well. On their arrival in America, he directed that they should not be left to shift for themselves, but that they should be sent to the interior, where they would be employed at once. These little traits will show the character of the man. On Admiral Boyle's estate in Donegal, consisting nearly the whole parish of Aileen, and a portion of others, he settled on the parish priest a glebe of 30 acres, and built a handsome house for him. Such was the character of the late proprietor of Broadlands.

"Palmerston Girls." Heedless to the Protestant Vicar of the parish double the rent required of the Catholic priest because a glebe was given to the latter, which Lord Palmerston has kept for the next Incumbent, being let only from year to year, and the Vicar's family, which, from the poverty of the parishioners of Ireland, he could not be ranked as an absentee, as he spent from one half to two thirds of his income in Ireland, and that in the form of improvements, improving the estate by drainage and roads, and planting first and the best maintained estate in the county of Sligo, and he effectually stopped their spreading over the property.

LORD PALMERSTON AS AN AUTHOR.

The Athenæum gives us a glimpse of his Lordship as an author :—

Pretty early in life Lord Palmerston began to write; and, though he was not a voluminous author, he left behind him a number of literary efforts, which have wrongly fallen into the sere and yellow leaf, and are going on. The "New Whig Guide," a pleasant satire on the Whigs of the day, which was published anonymously in 1819, was written by Lord Palmerston, Lord Porchester, and Mr. Wilson Croker. Palmerston wrote a sparkling piece of banter under the title of "Paper Money for the Million," published for sale "by a Member of the Society of Women." This squib is very like the Harry Temple of late years. Brougham is found guilty, in the Palmerston pamphlet, of having interfered in the way that vilified the Prince Regent. Lord Palmerston also contributed a plan for reforming the Board of Trade, on Benthamite principles, involving a decimal system into Parliament. Had he cultivated this talent for drollery he might, perhaps, have left behind him a literary reputation as well as a political one. He won too early in life, advanced him from literature, which never grew to be his chief occupation. He left behind him a mass of letters and papers, chiefly on official subjects, and many of these are now being published and despatches, have great merits. The public would be glad to see letters and papers of a more personal character, such as those of Horace Walpole.

HIS LORDSHIP AS A SPORTSMAN.

Lord Palmerston was at heart a horseman, and his turf career is thus described in the Times :—

During the season there was no more interesting sight, particularly to the stranger visitor, than to see Lord Palmerston, rather tall and upright, mounted on his horse's head straight down the Row, and pounding away in a long swing pace at last, taking no notice of anybody and not to be interfered with in making his progress. This was the daily "constitutional," and about the most invigorating exercise which the veteran statesman ever could command. He was again every now and then of his riding down to the Derby, or mounting his pack and going down to Newmarket to see the Two Thousand run. It was not in the year 1810 he ran a filly called Mignionette at Winchester, while, some of the Jockey Club were present, he was not in the habit of the race, course during the past summer, with the three-year-old Wade, by Wild Dayrell, out of Mrs. Williamson, by Sir Hercules, for the Cup at Goodwood. This property, bought by agreement with the late Prime Minister, won the opening race at Ryde. It was in 1857, following his Lordship's lead, that Mr. Cowper's Buccaneer took rank as a favourite, and did, some amusing sensation with the most renowned runner he ever possessed. The same year, Mr. Cowper, now Lord Mount Temple, purchased Lord Palmerston's interest in Buccaneer, no longer the humble provincial, was the great Derby favourite, and, as he was beaten, Mr. Cowper, at Newmarket, as this victory might be to the master of Broadlands, it was rendered still more so by the success of Buccaneer in the Derby. Lord Palmerston's connection with the turf was not confined to racing. He was a large proprietor of the name of the stake, the whole world found still more interested in the success of the country horse. Lord Palmerston's early warfare was carried on on the colors of the Orange or Osborne. The paint was ultimately referred, and was a dark green, with a red sash, and cap of the same colours. Originally, when a decision was given in favour of the o long, and, of course, the Osborne colours were lowered. This sash and cap were the original Lord Palmerston's horse, who gradually reached them, however, and, to the surprise of the spectators

MEMBERS OUT OF PARLIAMENT.

If the Conservative party have unpleasant reminiscences of the late general election, they seem inclined to take the advice as to the treatment of care given in the old festive song, and seek to drown it in the bowl. They are feasting after the usual heavy fashion, and considering each other by the administration of toxic doses of confidence in the future, which are taken according to the prescription which directs bark to be exhibited with port wine. Every, in there has been a demonstration which was meant to be a consolation for the loss of a seat in the representation of the county. The trying-place was Castle Heddingham, which as so associated with the name of Major Beresford that one rubs one's eyes and stares again when one finds that he is not there. More substantial than some finished candidates, he performing the supererogatory work of explaining his joke; and the special object of his appearance was, while he dedicated to the audience that he has made a point if it so happens that they did not see it. One can imagine with how this by-play came into action when he brought out his idea that the earth and the sun was an agreement in the matter of the malt tax, and took the new line on that question, which is a shifting of the incidence of the case from the people to the people among them. The representative system, as embodied in Mr. Du Cane, was supported by Mr. Barle, who had the satisfaction of knowing that the Anti-Corn Law Liberal member who had kept broken the continuity of Conservatism in Essex; but, though Mr. Western has been pushed out of the borough, his brother, Sir Thomas, as the new member for the northern division, still keeps the representation open, and, perhaps, with more effect, since a lodgment under those auspices is made in the camp itself as sure, patent to the general inquiry give so special reason why Mr. Barle should go down to an Essex meeting rather than that he should have escaped Berwick in 1859. A reason may be found for his absence in the circumstance that there is no place in the Conservative interest in the circumstance of his having been private secretary to Mr. Disraeli when he was Chancellor of the Exchequer, a man was last in office, for, if he is not the rose, he has lived near the rose, and comes anywhere amongst us with the requisite odour strong upon him. He made a very fair speech, well-reasoned and antithetical in parts here, and there were touches which indicated the master of rhetoric under whose wing he had been brought up.

There is, we will not say some pretext, but some reason for the Conservative North Warwickshire banquet which has been announced, each other on the result of the election. For here there was a serious contest, Mr. Bracebridge, the Liberal candidate, having beaten by less than 400 votes in a constituency of nearly 6000 At Solihull we have one off, a day or two ago, a second feast in honour of the success of Mr. Newdegate and Mr. Davenport Bromley; and the circumstance of having just suggests a hint that it is possible to overdo this kind of thing. Although he had to repeat the part he had played before, Mr. Newdegate was equal to the occasion, for he was as grandly, perhaps more pompously, circular than ever. He was still in a high position that wonderfully solemn earnestness of manner, and that rotund tone of insinuation and implication, which always give a sense of power as if he has within secrets and information too portentous to be clothed in plain, commonplace, straightforward language. He was loud-shaking, and that adjective voice of warning which ought to make him sullen—but, which, in the House, at least, is accepted as though it were felt that the provocation was not to be resented, but rather to be taken every minute. It is comfort-ing for the public to know from Mr. Newdegate that the spirit of Danish question in the House of Commons; and it is consolatory to hear from him that his old friend Mr. Bromley is not only not any more pronounced—than ever, and that so long as we keep awake we are secure; but we must remember that we cannot be always awake for safety. According to the testimony of his colleague, Mr. Davenport Bromley has been a great foe for the Church, and we are glad to learn that he may be said to have been living from his birth in a parliamentary atmosphere, inasmuch as he inhabits a house which was built for one of his ancestors by the Honourable Corporation without out of the house. This honourable member, not without some qualifications, seems inclined to set up as a joker of jokes, and to add to his profession at this gathering, being very facetious on Feniasism, which he bracketed with Sir Robert Peel's portmanteau as the most equal interest in a public sense; but he was not equally successful in making the point of his humour clear when he spoke of the number of Feniaus who were always going about trying to stab the Constitution in the back. It must, however, that this does not prove Mr. Bromley is equally assidu ous in interpreting his body between them and the Constitution's victim; and this occurrence, added to the distinct assertion of Mr. Newdegate that his vigilance over the body politic was equal to the emergency, and the suspicion of confidence in the contemplation of the coming winter which must be very agreeable to the inhabitants of the country.

It is true that in Cambridgeshire the integrity of Conservatism has not been always preserved, for Mr. Adeane, who sat for the county since 1837, was a Liberal. But he was a Cambridgeshire man, and was also a member of the country party proper as a Liberal could be. When, therefore, it is a fact that this place was retired at the general election, he has been filled by an interloper, who is presumed to be stronger in the creed Liberal than Mr. Adeane, who, though he has a place—we will not venture to say a seat—in the Isle of Ely, writes himself down as a London merchant and shipowner; and when before Mr. Young there, without a contest, Mr. Eliot Yorke, who has been for a long time member of the county since 1834, it may be predicated that the Conservatives require a little refreshing stimulant; and they have got it at the Farmers' Club, at Newmarket. It was not a bad idea to get one of the Suffolk men to join the party and to appear as one of the county members for both counties, for, by a little effort of imagination, the country might have fancied that the two representatives of Cambridgeshire were addressing them in succession. Lord George Manners came out positively vigorous in an argument to prove that it was not in his power to make a good speech; and he cited regarding the well-known story of Addison, who was excused for not being promptly eloquent by an assertion that, if he had any disqualification for the purpose of just so much training as will enable him hereafter to play the part of the Chamber of Trade, without losing their most legal suffering and impalpable assembly.

Having accepted the responsibilities attached to the representation of a new constituency, Sir Charles Wood has thought it judicious to lay aside the habit, which he was at last obliged to break through, which he adopted at Halifax, of never showing the light of his remarkable countenance on his constituents from one election to another; and he has appeared at Ripon—naturally and obviously enough—under the wing of Earl De Grey, beneath whose fostering care a borough which in former times was a sure city of refuge for contest Conservative Candidates, now would seem only to admit Liberals even to struggle for the seals which are within it. For at the general election the contest was between three Liberals, and Mr. Greenwood, one of the late members, was put out, not on the ground of defective politics it must be certain. Sir Charles Wood is a great master of cool audacity; but even he must have felt a little quavering when he talked about the late election being conducted without any bitterness or party feeling. Party feeling in Ripon! Why, never was contest more purely personal, for the party feeling, Tory or Radical, under they cared only for themselves, and the Liberal party, as it pours on them from its vital source at Studley Royal. Of public affairs Sir Charles said little except that he looked for expected; and, perhaps, the great point of his speech was that he counted Disraeli and the Derby party out of the question, as if it were that there was not much in either of them. But Sir Charles Wood is such an unfathomable optimist that he never observes his equanimity and see nothing of consequence in the matter, if he can help it, and that by a somewhat free application of the natives India had been restored to the dominion of the Mogul.

MIGRATORY BIRDS AND WOODCOCK-SHOOTING.

THOSE who delight to contemplate the wonders of Nature and "view her stores unroll" in the habits of the feathered tribes will find their attention than the migration of birds. Who that should look upon the chilled and lifeless bodies of little sparrows lying cold at its history, would imagine that it travels some hundreds of miles to visit us every year? Yet so it is. The swallow comes in its course upon the approach of autumn? It does not wait for the chilly blast to warn it to go, but leaves us as if it would not stay till the summer's rose had faded. But to speak at any length about "Jane Philomel" would be the utter out of place at this period of the year, and therefore let us look to another migratory bird which is now arriving on our shores, and which, after passing a few months in the dreary country, intends to escape the rigour of that season by a visit to France.

The woodcock, to which we allude, may be truly called our winter companion. Not that, strictly speaking, he is not to be seen during the complaint which we so frequently hear of the increasing scarcity of woodcock in this island. As many of the best spots are inclosed to lay blame at other people's doors than at their own, we often hear the complaint that the fact of the inhabitants of Epping Forest, Chevy Chase, the New Forest, and numerous others, no longer rival the New Forest glens as in days gone by, and that the pheasants in them are thoroughly shot. Can we wonder, then, that a bird which never once the guarded coverts, and will not sojourn in a field or meadow, should become scarcer? Birds and beasts must have their haunts, and those that may be domesticated, are affected by the changes and progress which are continually taking place in the face of the country. Instances of such of them as chiefly feed upon its products will of necessity increase. While cotton, which feed upon the leaves or the stems of vegetables, will decrease. Thus it is that within the last sixty years (during which agricultural improvements as well as inclosures have been carried on with greater enterprise and success than they have been in any other part of the world at any other time) such species of game as hares, pheasants, and partridges have increased, while the blackcock, the bustard, the capercailzie, the common grouse, the woodcock, the snipe, and the various kinds of wild duck have become rare, or have entirely vanished in numbers. We are aware that it may be said, in contradiction to this, that the latter are protected more than the former, and that is so ever was, and we do not deny it. That is the effect of strict preservation upon game, but the question is, the cause. Now, to answer that question fear it must be owned that we have less than formerly. Generally speaking, those who have enclosed have also drained, and rather than there used to be, and the falling off in some kinds is more than counterbalanced by the great increase in others. The hare, the heron, the mallard are no longer to be found where the snipe and the jack-snipe formerly abounded, have supplied their place. We ought to mention, however, that, though the woodcock is more than ever shot, the number of many parts has been carried to a great extent, in others young plantations have been destroyed, and the woodcock has left.

We allude to the planting of the hillsides in mountainous parts of the country, which extensive operations have unfortunately deprived many of the Scotch, has since been imitated elsewhere. We have heard of woodcocks in covers in Devonshire, which, before the trees had been transplanted, nothing but the fern-bush or bramble, and where they little thought they had anything to do with the woodcock. It may not be inappropriately called an acquisition of new territories for the woodcock, which, in many instances, make up for its losses in other parts.

When we unfold the map of England, and cast our vast distance, both over land and sea, that woodcocks have to travel ere they arrive upon our shores, it appears a matter of astonishment that such delicate and tender fray—such as a sudden change of wind, which may prevent thousands from reaching us. But, as upon reviewing the subject we find that, in spite of distress, they have been known to alight upon the rigging of a vessel at sea, which is the last thing they would seem to do in their last extremity of danger, so few birds are more desirous of keeping aloof from society than the woodcock, which has even been known to seek safety upon the branch of the tree under which they feed. The woodcock certainly migrates by night, and the small quantity of shot which will bring it down proves that it does not fly high. Its habits, however, are more wonderful that it should successfully endure the hardships of such a voyage. That it does endure them is amply proved by the unprevented condition in which it frequently arrives amongst us. It frequently arrives in a state which proves that it has had a long a flight has a great disinclination to fly far when disturbed, and will rise, if it can help it, within a very short one, and it is only when shot at once or twice, or much disturbed by dogs, that it will go any distance. Its powers of flight, however, are of a curious circumstance, and one we have often observed, that large flocks are rarely found in the same spot, but that, should one descend on the morrow, by the sudden manner in which they disappear, as if they were not there. We do not mean from the setting in of a hard frost, so, of course, under such circumstances they would retire to the heads of the springs; but we have frequently known these hasty changes of abode to take place when no change of weather has happened, however, when the elements were stormy, and in covers of a lofty elevation—such as those upon the side of a hill. In that case, the cocks will either seek the lower woods or shift their quarters to the other side of the hill, where they will remain for a week, and in this manner procure shelter from the tempest. Should there be no wood on the other side of the hill they will generally seek another abode, though at some distance.

The woodcock, as the sportsman is what salmon-fishing is to the follower of old Izaak Walton, and the pheasant to the game-preserver. Sufficient enough to beguile the hours of the prized bird we shall not attempt to describe it, but will give this exciting recreation we recommend a short gun, as being by far the handiest to take aim with in strong covers, where it is difficult to move the arms amidst the branches of trees, and to fire at the bird as it flies through the openings, and thus multiplying the marksman's chance, more especially with woodcock, that fall as it were, right down, and as we have already stated. The longnose, or langnasen, as the Germans call them, migratory birds, are universally known, and are to be found in the frigid and torrid zones, in the Old and the New World. We hear of them in Greenland, Russia, Norway, Iceland, Sweden, Poland, Silesia, Persia, Ceylon, Guines, Barbary, on the Gold Coast, in the inlet of Senegal, in England, France, Germany, Louisiana, Illinois, and Canada.

The Queen has approved of Mr. Louis Bois as Consul-General at the Cape of Good Hope for the King of the Belgians; and of Mr. George Long as Consul at Sydney, with jurisdiction over New South Wales, for the King of Italy.

Archæology of the Month.

The restoration of Guildhall will, it is expected, be fully completed in time for the inauguration banquet on Lord Mayor's Day—the most interesting spectacle of its class in England, if not in Europe—which given in an edifice which is rich beyond compare in association with great events in our history. The new roof has succeeded, with a few unsightly ceiling, which was placed upon the hall after the recently completed, has been carried with the roof of Westminster Hall, which, however, it does not approach in picturesqueness. The Guildhall restoration has occupied two years, and funds have been generously voted by the Common Council. The new work is stage to be in strict accordance with the roof of 450 years since, of which a drawing is extant. There have been several departures from the works originally proposed by the restorers, and it is to be hoped that the architectural authorities will exercise discretion in the right way in all its pristine grandeur. The Perpendicular windows, with their stone-work and wooden tracheries into the shade of two centuries since.

The Hall of Guildhall has been a scene of elegant festivity. The dejeuner of the new Sheriffs on Monday, the 10th inst., with Mr. Alderman Gibbons, the senior Sheriff, being a leading member of the Salters' Company. Their wood plate was upon that occasion, admirably displayed upon a buffet, and included a massive silver tankard, more than 200 years old; and several loan pieces, one of which has been in the possession of the company since the year of the Spanish Armada. The Sheriffs gave their inauguration banquet in this noble apartment, which, by the way, is undergoing extensive decoration, and will be the hall of the Salters' Company." This is an error. The present hall, the fifth in succession, was built in 1822-7, and the old hall has a music-gallery, and is many with banners from the ceiling, and over the doorways are busts of Alderman Gibbons, notwithstanding many migrations, have been handsomely housed, and their annals are carefully preserved by a Salter alumnus, who has acted as chief usher at the coronation of Richard III., and was represented at the coronation of Henry VII. The original of the Salters' only printed pageant was sold, in 1818, for twenty guineas; in their books is a warrant for the payment of twenty pence (!) for Richard III., and a pie so made by the Company's cook in 1836 was found excellent. In the waiting-room to the hall of the Salters' Company is a chair of State to Salters in 1506—Ki 13s. 2d.; though we do not quote the above as a precedent for the Lord Mayor's chair. The Salters' Company, which is a very wealthy one, is also a great patron of fine art. Sir Benjamin Stone, architect, and was one of the British Institution, and is a fine work of ornament. "The Olympus," says a writer in that, now the Charing-cross Hotel is finished, the name of Hungerford will be blotted out from the site of the Salters' only.

Talking of topography, we have just seen the greater portion of a map of London engraved in the year 1560 by a lady-collector of rare taste, without either name or date, but bearing in its upper left-hand corner a dedication to Sir Thomas Gresham, "Mercer, Councell, and Fellow of the Royal Society." It is beautifully engraved, and is full of information as to the position of the Royal House and Albemarle House; the latter was taken down in 1683, and Devonshire House on the site in 1684. The Tower is very neatly shown in "birdseye;" and here we see the palace portion, of which it has been stated so little is preserved. St. Paul's Cathedral is very incorrectly given, the dome especially. The map is of great interest to general collectors and collectors of London illustrations, but the date and engraver have not been ascertained. The variations in the names of streets do not always appear to be warranted: Hemming's-row is, in this old map, Dirty-lane. Here, also, we find Gresham's mansion, built by him, in 1706, "between Old-street easterly and Goswell-street westerly." How was this work executed? From the examples of it in other places go for to three dozenth on its derivation from "Roole ou Roi."

We need scarcely call attention to the valuable descriptive articles on "The Parks of London," which have recently appeared in the Times, and are now being called forth Mr. Mackenzie's contribution. "Rotten Row" has long been a favourite road over Quarries.

It pertains more to philology than to archæology to record the death of Mr. Richard Garnett, the author of "A Philosophy of the English Language," which, in authorities for the application of words, is the most valuable work of the class before the public. We happen to know that before Dr. Richardson set down to his great labours, he had consulted this two thousand pound worth of books for the purpose.

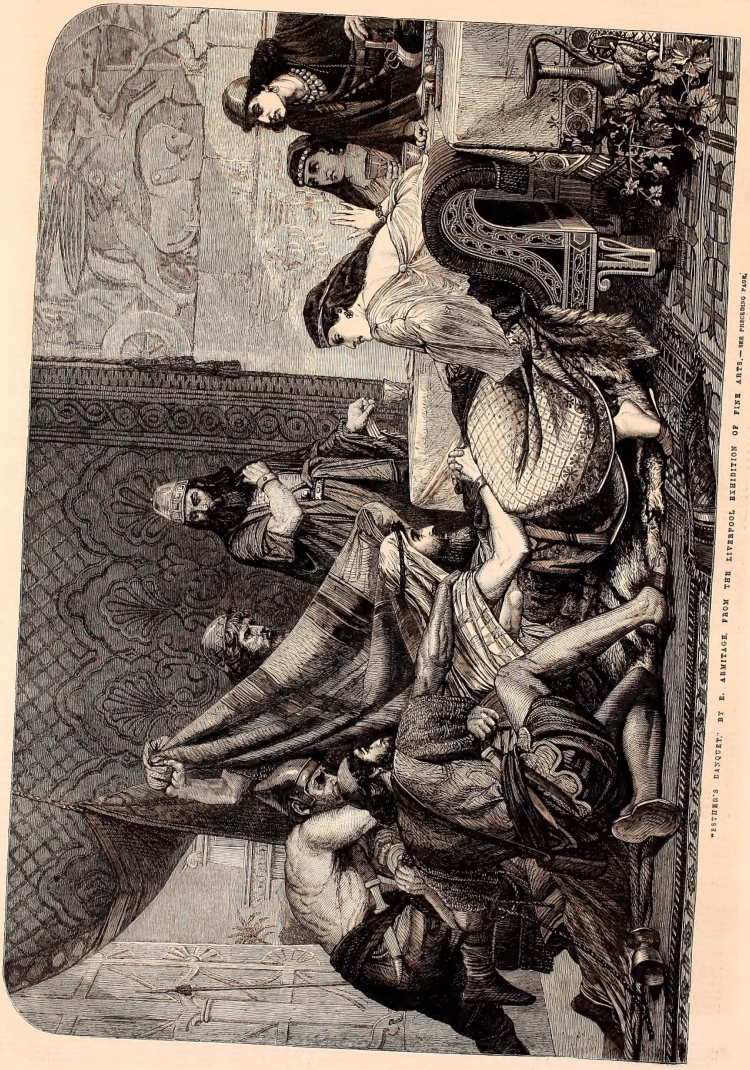
During some summer alterations, by Mr. Redgrave, in the hanging of the pictures at Hampton Court Palace some fine old tapestry has been discovered. It is in a state of preservation, and was evidently made for the panels of the room in which it has been found, and is said to represent some of the battles of Alexander the Great; but it is not at present known where the square was worked, or where it was put up. Could it have been produced at Sir Francis Crane's short-lived manufactory at Mortlake? The colours are bright, even the Danish artist; and the fabric in costliness vied with the finest Gobelins. Should this be a newly-discovered tapestry at Hampton Court should be compared with the tapestry in the Board of Green Cloth Room, and that in the Bishop of Durham's Palace.

Rich stuffs and ornaments of household.

An interesting addition is about to be made to personal history, now so popular. A little diary of Admiral Sir George Collier, the same who commanded in the North American Antiquette was just owned, and who was a guest at the petits soupers of Louis XV., is about to be presented to the reading public by his granddaughter.

From the report of the progress of the new bridge at Blackfriars we learn that the centres of the arches have been removed except two piers, which are temporarily used for staging. The timber taken out from the old foundations is found to be in a sound state.

The Thames Embankment is proceeding well. The York House water-gate, at the end of Buckingham-street, is to be removed to a side opposite the centre of Whitehall-gardens, where will be a landing-stage for small craft. The embankment has been most usefully applied on one of the contracts. Messrs. Dollman and Francis, of Kingsgate-street, have taken several large photographs showing the principle of "interlocking" adopted, as likewise the piles were driven, and the application of iron and timber dams, all of which will be most interesting records.



We regret to learn that the restoration of the ancient Church of St. Ruben, Babbegate-road—one of the most remarkable specimens of ecclesiastical architecture in the city of London—cannot be proceeded with. Funds have not been subscribed even for the needful repairs. The parishioners have provided the means for restoring the decayed roof of the south chantry, but the architects have discovered that the entire roof of the nave is in such a dilapidated condition that the positively dangerous to resume Divine service until the roof is repaired. In former years the worn-stone has been covered with brown paper, and at this moment there is scarcely a timber in the whole roof that is not rotten. To restore the church as it ought to be completed will require liberal aid, which the reverend Vicar earnestly solicits from those wealthy members of the Church who are possessed of archæological taste no less than the disposition to adorn and beautify the house of God, which now lies waste."

CURRENT LITERATURE.

Man and the Gospel. By Thomas Guthrie, D.D. (Alexander Strahan). The perversity of man is in no case more apparent than in the preparation of books for publication. Sometimes we have an explanatory preface or introduction, sometimes we have none, and the less explanation is needed the more certain we are to have it. Here is a book, the title of which is almost as vague as anything could be; and yet there is not a word of prefatory admonition to tell us what we are to expect in it. It is sermon, or essay, or a story, or a critical dissertation, or missionary statistics, or an exposition of the Gospel? The case is not quite met by a broad examination of the interior, what manner of literary production it may lie between decent covers. There are fifteen different pieces with fifteen different headings, the thirteenth piece being divided into two parts, and the fourteenth into four parts, and prefaced to each piece is a passage of scripture, from which one is to gather what one is to want. And the author's name favours that supposition. But whether the sermons were preached—and if so, where?—or whether they have astonished if not scandalised a Scotch congregation—or not, those who never heard either or heard of them were left entirely to conjecture, in the present state of the prophetic or divining faculty, to determine. But, whatever may have been their origin, there can be no doubt but that they may be read to great profit by many classes of persons who profess to believe, but forget to practise, the precepts of the Gospel. The author's name suggests eloquence, vigour, poetry, and grace; and the discourses will not disappoint those who like their spiritual nourishment in a form expounded, vigorous, poetical, and graceful. That the author, however, is not always strictly logical may be inferred from the opening words of the very first discourse He says: "There is an old story of two knights who fell into a controversy—almost came to blows—about a shield, the one asserting, and prepared with his sword to maintain, that the shield was made of gold; the other as positively asserting that it was made of pure but silver. Both were right." Now, without stopping to ask whether the illustration (for the word is misapplied as an illustration) be correct, the question arises, and whether, according to the common account, the knights did not fall quite, and not "almost," to blows? Perhaps one would be inclined to assert that the controversy, so far from being "both right," were both wrong; they were equally incorrect, no doubt; and so very often are religious controversies, which are not of a corner spiece of the stone which is their stumbling block, and which, when seen in its entirety, is as valuable as what some controversialists supposed it to be as the limits of dissimilitude will allow.

Tales for the Marines. By Walter Wood (Simpkin Low, Son, and Marston.) This is a collection, in two volumes, of sketches, such as are introduced, before they assume the dignity of a book, in certain periodicals, and a sometimes photographically exact, sometimes photographically inaccurate picture of naval life. The sometimes photographically inaccurate picture of naval life. The sketches display great ingenuity, especially in the choice of taking titles, which now and then are as deceptive as a will-o'-the-wisp; and it has at his command a well-stored vocabulary of nautical words, with the proper accompaniments of maidens, blood, poison, round oaths, and fervent prayer. He is unfortunately not free from the similitudes; but into what grass exaggerations and unnatural comparisons a love for tracing resemblances between unlike objects can be seen in the very first page of the first volume, when we read of "the robin puffing out his little crimson ill-will as he flies off to some other man's waistcoat." Could anything be more far-fetched? Would anybody, except strikers after similitudes, write "the robin puffing out his ill-will as the delivery toll," any resemblance to blustered salmon? But let such small matters pass: "Tales for the Marines," no doubt, "will serve."

Ingoes. By Mr. Oliphant. (Hurst and Blackett.) A small head which escaped us though it was under our eyes for a week or so, and "folded in magnificent braids;" a delicate throat; cheeks colourless save for a passing blush; and voice which, when it spoke, made those were sad without meaning it, without knowing why," had been given by Nature in a blackbird's throat. Then, "Ingoes" was lost for a fatal chasm of opening up, when they were fairly seen, "two wonderful eyewines into the unpenetrable, inner recesses of a human wonderful, then, if a young squire, fresh from Oxford, finding himself seated beside the blackbird, "thought the eyes of Ingoes the most sensational head beside the blackbird, "thought the eyes of Ingoes the most sensational head beside the blackbird, "thought the eyes of Ingoes the most sensational head

HERE'S another ballad, Of a fish, that appeared upon the coast, on Wednesday, the fourteen of April, forty thousand fathom above water, and sung this ballad about the hard hearts of maids.

This passage from "The Winter's Tale," act iv. scene 3, was quoted by Leslie on the exhibition at the Royal Academy, in 1846, of the picture we have engraved (page 425) from the Shespeharde' gift in continuation of our series of Engravings from pictures of the British School, belonging to the nation, at the South Kensington Museum. The passage at once gives the clue to the audacious humour of the ballad-singer and the rustic folly of the rustics who buy it. The lost daughter of the King of Sicilia, was long fostered and surrounded. There is perhaps none of Shakspeare's minor characters more admirably and laughably individualised than that professional pedler and incurable "rogue" Autolycus, and surely nothing could more aptly express the poet's conception than the painter's representation of the character before us—with his pack of cheap and tawdry, but to the simple and vain irresistibly attractive wares under before him; with his rakishly cloudless hat and draggled feather, his rapacious, as convenient to the purse, yet unconscientious "trifles," and now overfacing his lying ballads with such an air of entire good faith and unctuous satisfaction in their merits; then christened Autolycus, after that famous robber of old, and doubtless were, thus, like "Jack" in the "Pilgrim's Progress," "Who can forget how he is introduced in the play? Seeing a "clown" approach, counting the money he has to make purchases for a sheepshearing feast, he throws himself prostrate on the road in the extremity of passion, pretending to have been robbed by a fellow whom "some call Autolycus," and who, having stripped him, leaves him only the miserable rags in which he is found. So badly is he hurt that the good-natured clown has much difficulty in raising him, only a little until Autolycus manages to ease the encumbered clown of his purse, when, in purest gratitude, the tricky rogue proposes to take care of the feast. And at the feast accordingly Autolycus appears, as successfully disguised (as we see him here) that he contrives again to "cozen" the same poor clown. Perdita and Florizel, with the disguised father of Florizel, the King of Bohemia, and Camillo, the fugitive Lord, are principal actors at that feast; but evidently we have here only the "clown," with his bow-backed crook, the "Mopsa, Dorcas, and other "low-life" rustic lasses of the scene about to be performed—who, in short, only the easy victims of the cunning Autolycus. Upon the scene of the sheepshearing feast Autolycus bursts, singing, at first, in praise of his wares, when, after some preliminary squabbling among the jealous rustics, occurs the following colloquy:—

Clown. What have I here? Ballads?

Mopsa. Pray now, buy some; I love a ballad in print a' life; for then we are sure they are true.

Autolycus. Here's one to a very doleful tune, how a usurer's wife was brought to bed of twenty money bags at a burden; and how she longed to eat adders' heads, and toads carbonadoed.

Mopsa. Is it true, think you?

Aut. Very true, and but a month old.

Dorcas. Bless me from marrying a usurer!

Aut. Here's the midwife's name to it, one Mistress Taleporter; and five or six honest wives that were present: why should I carry lies abroad?

Mop. Pray you now, buy it.

Clo. Come on, lay by your ware; and hear the ballads; we'll buy the other things anon.

Aut. Here's another ballad, of a fish—and so on, as already quoted in our first paragraph. We think no more need be said to recall the particular scene and exact moment of the play here rendered in the language of painting with much of the exquisite art of our prince of book-illustrators.

THE ISLE OF MUSSOWAH, IN THE RED SEA.

MUSSOWAH, in long. east 37 deg. 15 min., lat. north 15 deg. 36 min., belonging now to the dominions of the Pasha of Egypt, is an island about half a mile long and a quarter of a mile broad, situated about a hundred yards from the African coast. Like many other islands in the Red Sea, it is a coral formation, and attains to the height of 100 feet above the level of the sea. There is not a spring of water to be found in the island; such a tree or blade of grass as is to be met with on the island is used as a Mussulman burying-ground, near which is the Roman Catholic chapel, shown to the left in our Engraving. Here we have engraved. Christians are not allowed to bury on the island, but find a cemetery for their dead on the opposite coast, which is also shown at the extreme right of the View. In the background, on the mainland, as far as the eye can reach, are mountains of considerable height and higher, range above range, until lost in distance; these constitute the high lands of Abyssinia. The other half of Mussowah is inhabited by the few miserable human beings who are dependent on the whole town. There are a few caterns in the Mussulman cemetery at last, as it rains only perhaps twice in the year. Many are reported to be filled; and water has to be brought daily from the villages of the neighbouring shore, about four miles distant. The population is difficult to be ascertained (though some say about 8000), since most of the people reside in neighbouring villages, and come only occasionally to the transact business, and bring water and other supplies. The bazaar is bad, vegetables scarce, and meat indifferent. There is no trade except in gold, hides, and wax; the imports are red cloth, cotton goods, beads, and, formerly, powder and shot to a great extent, but these latter are now contraband articles. All the trade is in the hands of the Banians—a money-making race from India—and is sent by them generally to Hodeida, on the coast of Yemen (the Arabian side opposite), and thence to Egypt. Last year a kafila came from the interior with 100,000 dollars' worth of gold dust and gold. The smaller kafilas, with hides and wax, come almost weekly; Turkish steamers run from Suez to Hodeida, and many native boats come across to Mussowah; but, during the south-east monsoon, this is a most tedious voyage—sometimes of as much as twenty, many weeks; and the Rev. Father De la Monde, the Roman Catholic Chaplain, was once thirty days on the passage. The tides rise and fall on the same side of the Red Sea and about 265 miles distant; whereas, during the north-westerly monsoon, favourable winds will bring a native boat across in a few days, and vice versâ.

The inhabitants of the country near are pastoral, and often possess immense flocks and herds—an occupation that has probably caused the last disposition. They are extremely bigoted; and, as a proof of this, we may mention the reverence with which they regard a certain old man who professes to have miraculous powers; for instance, in a case of sickness the patient, when asked what he has had to eat, says on him two or three times and mumbles some verses of the Koran; and then, after some more mummery, finishes by spitting on some of the spittle on the face of the sick person. The Arabs are very fond of tying a piece of raw hide on or near the part affected. In some cases (probably hypochondriac or neuralgic), strange to say, a cure appears to have some effect, which tends to continue and increase the popularity of the Sheikh and to fill his pocket also; but to show what little faith they have in their own medicine, they will not even take him as Dr. Blanc (a physician who is attached to the Abyssinian Political Mission) for more scientific treatment. On one occasion an old man wanted medicine for rheumatism, from which he was suffering. Dr. Blanc therefore gave him some ointment, and directed him to go on board the steamer to have it made up, and to rub the ointment which he would receive in the following morning or evening. He thought all the efficacy consisted in the paper prescription, and so forbidden himself with it, whereas the next two days afterwards he came again for advice, stating that he did not feel well yet, and that the paper was all he could use it so longer!

Until about fifty years ago, the people of Mussowah were Christians; but when the Mussulman proper religion arrived, they became an easy prey to a fanatic Mussulman, who devoted his life and fortune to their perversion, and, by bribing their Sheikh, through his influence succeeded. These people are naturally of a happy disposition, and seem in their wild seclusion to enjoy a healthy existence. Near Mussowah there used to be a great traffic in slaves. About 8000 annually were exported to the various Turkish and Egyptian ports in the Red Sea, but it is believed that, owing to the pressure of the British flag, this practice does not now exist.

We are indebted to Dr. Blanc for most of this information, and to Lieutenant S. S. Jacob, of the Bombay Staff Corps, Assistant Engineer at Aden, for the View we have engraved, which may prove of interest—Mussowah being the head-quarters, at present, of the Special Mission sent to effect the release of the Abyssinian captives and the place where Consul Cameron used to reside.

CHESS.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

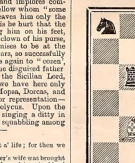
AMATEUR.—I. The very best book for you is the late "I. B., of Bridport," nearly 200 in number, can be procured of Messrs. Tribner and Co., 60, Paternoster-row. 2. The other work so admired by Messrs. B. Lop and Horwitz, has long been out of print.

BETA.—The solution of twelve to three kept in stock by Messrs. Hardwicke, of King William-street, Strand, price 1s. 6d.

ALPHA.—Your problem is very pretty, but the mate is palpable.

J. YOUNGSTER should avoid his new and elaborate, and like style of the periodical in which it appears, and confine his practice to the openings that have been luminously explained, and which require study.

D. R. S.—The result of the play in the second and third instance at Dublin has not yet reached us.



F. M.—Extremely elegant in design, but impracticable in execution. Could you not accept, with some modification, the suggestion? Your solution of Black claim a fair moiety of a Queen against the mate.

W. T. FISHER.—1. You have been misinformed, and should address all communications for the Chess Column to the Editor, 198, Strand. 2. The problem was received and duly examined.

BLACK.

WHITE.
White, playing first, gives mate in three moves.

THE DUBLIN CHESS CONGRESS.

The following Game is played in the chief Tournament of the above Meeting.—(Publisher's Defence.)

BLACK (Rev. E. Buckley).	WHITE (Rev. G. J. Macdonnell).	BLACK (Rev. E. Buckley).	WHITE (Rev. G. J. Macdonnell).
1. P to K 4th	P to K 4th	18. P to K 4th	B to K 3rd
2. Kt to K B 3rd	P to Q 3rd	19. Q to Q B 2nd

(Black should have hesitated to remove the Queen from her prompt post of retreat, but the move is not bad. The game can also be effectually secured by moving the Bishop a step.)

3. P to Q 4th	P takes P	20. Kt to Q B 3rd	P to Q B 3rd
4. Kt takes K P	Kt to K B 3rd	21. Kt to K 5th	Q to Q 2nd

(This is worse than useless, since it not only blocks the game, but pushes the Knight, already well placed, still more back into safety. Such moves, Mr. Staunton recently remarks with the K B, Pawn and Knight, K R, Pawn and Knight, K Kt, Pawn and Knight, K B, Pawn and Knight, are of rare occurrence, and would be quite enough to do in looking at home.)

5. Kt to Q B 3rd	P to Q B 3rd	22. Kt to K B 4th	P to K 3rd
6. P to K 5th	P to Q 4th	23. Kt to Q B 3rd	P to Q B 4th
7. P to Q B 4th	P to K 3rd	24. Kt to Q 5th	P takes Q Kt P
8. Kt to Q B 3rd	P to Q Kt 3rd	25. B to K 3rd	P to K 4th
9. B to Q Kt 2nd	B to Q Kt 2nd	26. B to K B 2nd	P to K 5th
10. Castles on Q's side		27. Kt to Q 3rd	P to K B 4th

(The advance of this Kt appears no good purpose, and is doubtful to say the least.)

11. Castles on Q's side	B to K 2nd	28. Kt to K 2nd	P to K Kt 4th
12. P to Q 5th	P to K B 4th	29. Kt to Q 3rd	P to Q 5th

(It is not usually advisable to throw forward the Pawn in front of the King's Knight's Pawn, but in this instance it is necessary, by advancing it, Black weakens his position, and is subjected to setting embarrassment.)

13. P to K Kt 3rd	K to B sq	30. Kt to K 2nd	P to K 6th

(Black has not necessary to play the Pawn to K 6th, but it is a good move. Kt to K 4th, would surely have been better.)

14. P to K B 4th	P to Q 5th	31. B to Q 4th	P to Q Kt 5th
15. Q to Q B 3rd	Q to K 2nd	32. B to Q 3rd	P to Q Kt 6th

16. P takes P	B takes P	33. Q to Q Kt sq	P to Q 7th
17. P to K 5th	Q to K 3rd	34. Kt to K 4th	P to Q 8th (ch)
18. Q to Q B 3rd	K to K sq

(Black's Kt is now as well placed as possible, and his Pawn threatens to queen, but we should have chosen the Kt's pawn in preference to White's.)

17.	P to Q 4th	35. Kt to K B 3rd (ch)	P to Q Kt 7th and White wins.

Another Game in the same Tourney.—(King's Gambit declined.)

WHITE (Mr. Stanley).	BLACK (Rev. E. Goodwyn).	WHITE (Mr. Stanley).	BLACK (Rev. E. Goodwyn).
1. P to K 4th	P to K 4th	17. Kt to K 4th	Q to K 2nd
2. P to K B 4th	P to Q 4th	18. Q to K 3rd	Q to K B 2nd
3. P to K 5th	P to Q 4th	19. B takes B	B takes B
4. P to Q 3rd	P to K Kt 4th	20. B takes P	B to K 3rd
5. P to K Kt 4th	P to K B 3rd	21. P to K B 3rd	P to K B 3rd
6. P to K B 3rd	P to K Kt 3rd	22. Kt to K 3rd	Kt to K 4th
7. P to K Kt 5th	P to K 5th	23. Q to K 2nd	Q to K 3rd

10. P to K R 5th	P to K R 4th	26. Q to K 2nd	Q to K B 4th

11. B to Q Kt 5th (ch)	K to Q sq	27. Q to K 3rd	Q to K 3rd
12. B to K sq	B to K 4th	28. Q to Q 3rd	Q to K B 4th
13. Kt to Q B 3rd	Q to K Kt 3rd (ch)	29. Q to Q sq	Q to K 3rd
14. P to Q 4th	Kt to Q 2nd	30. Kt to K B 4th	Q to K B 4th
15. P to K 6th	P to K 6th	31. Kt to K 6th (ch)	K to K sq
16. P to K Kt 6th	P to K B 4th	32. Q to K B 4th	R to K 4th

(The Bishop would have protected the Q Kt P, and the Rook's position is no longer secure at move 32.)

33. Q to K Kt 4th	Q takes P	50. Q to K 4th	Q takes P
34. Q to Q Kt sq	Q to K 3rd	51. Q to K 3rd	Q to Q 8th

PARIS UNIVERSAL EXHIBITION OF 1867.

THE Committee of Council on Education (Science and Art Department) have published the general regulations of the Imperial commission for the Paris Exhibition of 1867. These regulations, which appear to be well considered and arranged, were discussed by the commissioners on the 7th of July, and approved by Imperial decree on the 12th of the same month.

Section I deals with the general arrangements and systems of classification. Its sets forth that the Universal Exhibition, for the reception of the works of art, and of the products of agriculture and industry of all nations, will be held in a temporary building on the Champ de Mars. It is to be opened on the 1st of April, 1867, and close on the 31st of October following. Around the exhibition building there will be a park for the reception of carts and other live animals, as well as for such constructions and objects as cannot be admitted in the main building. Local committees are established in every department of the French empire to transact the business of the exhibition in regard to such works intended to be specially calculated to be exhibited, and, above all, to promote the introduction of the agricultural products of the respective districts. A commission of experts will make a careful study of the exhibition, and publish a report upon the means of applying in the departments the lessons which the exhibition will afford. Subscriptions will be collected to enable crowners, agriculturists, and mechanics to visit and study the exhibition, and to pay the expense of publishing the reports. Necessary measures will be taken to obtain a proper representation of the products of Algeria and the other French colonies.

The contributions of foreign countries will be arranged through a commission specially formed by each country's Government. The commissions are now, for the most part, formed, and in communication with the Imperial commission. As products sent by a foreign exhibitor can be admitted except through the medium of the foreign commission representing him, we are charged with the custody, reception, and return of the productions of their countrymen. The English commissioners are the Science and Art Department of the South Kensington Museum. All communications in regard to the exhibition must be addressed to the secretary, with "Paris Exhibition, 1867," in the corner. The commissioners have now issued a printed form to be filled up by those who require space, and recommend intending exhibitors to apply for one soon, though Feb. 1, 1866, has been fixed as the last day for receiving demands for space. Plans drawn to scale will be required, and every facility given to facilitate the division of space, and before Jan. 31, 1866, plans in detail on a 1-10th scale will require to be submitted to each exhibitor. Each foreign country may claim for the formation of a special park a portion of the Champs de Mars, and, in order to the arrangement of such park, the Imperial commission publish the plans adopted by French exhibitors for arranging animals, plants, and models. In each section assigned to the exhibition of the same country the objects will be divided into groups, which are subdivided into ninety-five classes. The groups are as follow: 1st, Works of art; 2nd, apparatus and applications of the liberal arts; 3rd, furniture and articles intended for dwelling-houses; 4th, articles of clothing and other articles worn on the person; 5th, products of mining, both raw and manufactured; 6th, instruments and processes of the extractive arts; 7th, food, in various stages of preparation, both fresh and preserved; 8th, the products and implements of agriculture; 9th, products of fish, products and examples of horticultural establishments; 10th, objects exhibited with the special purpose of improving the moral and physical condition of the people. The fine arts of art or objects exhibits in the exhibition building or in the park will be allowed to be copied or reproduced in any manner with the authority of the exhibitors, except by such general views of the exhibition as the Imperial commissioners may allow. Works can be received before the close of the exhibition without special authority. There is no rent to pay, except for space occupied by refreshment rooms, cafés, and decorations.

The important special arrangements with reference to works of art are as follow:—Only such as have been executed since Jan. 1, 1855, will be received for exhibition. The following will not be received:—Copies, including those of pictures, unless a work is executed from the original; oil paintings, miniatures, water-colour paintings, drawings, and engravings framed or stained glass and pictures without frames, sculptures in unbaked clay.

The special arrangements governing the products of agriculture and industry prohibit the admission of detonating, explosive, and other inflammable substances. Exceptions to this, of course, exhibitions, percussion caps, fireworks, lucifer-matches, and similar articles, unless deprived of all inflammable properties. Poisons, oils, and essences must be in strong vessels of small dimensions, suitable for the purpose of exhibition. Exhibitors of apparatus requiring the use of water, gas, or steam must state the quantity which will be required. The rate of speed, and the motives power required.

There are special regulations for the dispatch, reception, and placing of goods in the exhibition building. The general administration and police arrangements will be under the Minister of the Interior, who will act in concert with the Paris Exhibition. An appendix to the regulations gives, in the French text, the various clauses coming under the groups enumerated above.

THE MADAGASCAR MISSION.

The Rev. W. Ellis, who, fifty years ago, left England for the South Seas, in the service of the London Missionary Society, addressed a public meeting on Monday week, and such day he met a large number of town and country members of that society, assembled in the usual meeting-place at the Mission-house in Blomfield-street. He must now number nearly seventy-five years of age. He was in the chair, and was received with loud cheers. For Sandwich group, and was occupied in missionary labours from 1816 to 1825. He then visited the United States and Canada, and in that period into Europe, and for the last twenty-four years has been principally occupied with the affairs of Madagascar.

In the course of the proceedings Mr. Ellis gave an account of the Madagascar mission. When he went there, in 1863, there were only three Christian congregations, with but a few score of communicants in each. Now there were seven large churches in and round the capital, and between 1200 and 1300 church members, and between 10,000 and 12,000 regular hearers of Autonomitive were Christians, and they were very numerous in the suburbs and villages around the capital. Christianity had taken deep root among the population; and, though the bonds of union, binding twelve missionaries, had been severed, the work of establishing over a Christianity in large numbers, so that in another generation the influence of the gospel would be universal. The missionaries constantly received information of the formation of Christian communities in the remotest parts of the island, even in the most distant and among the Betsileo. The missionaries had never visited these places; in some a European had never been seen. Christianity was spreading there almost entirely due to the influence of native military officers or traders who happened to go to the capital, and there obtained the opportunity of hearing the Gospel to their countrymen. He had a most satisfactory account to give of the character and conduct of the converts. The missionaries had not to contend in Madagascar, as they had in the South Seas and elsewhere, with a great superstition in the form of idolatry. Their difficulties arose from the hostility of the Government, and the persecution of some faithful converts. Many of these had been cruelly treated, and a conference between the missionaries and the Government had confirmed here they rather hung back for fear of unnecessarily provoking the hostility of the Government. Fortunately, the Queen represented a much wider spread of general Christian influence than in other parts of the Government.

Mr. Ellis proceeded to explain the difficulties with which he had had to contend in securing the property in the memorial churches which were now being erected for the society. The treaty with the English, which had been signed in June, contained a provision that the property of the London Missionary Society should be secured to it; but the legal advisers of the Government contended that the property was vested indefinitely belonged to the Queen, and the churches were claimed as the Government property. By firmness and tact, however, Mr. Ellis obtained a supplementary declaration that the Christians and their missionaries should be protected in the use and occupancy of the memorial churches, and this, in his belief, gave them as valid a title as any possessed in this island; written documents were given them. He, however, would strongly recommend that after the memorial churches had been put up, the sites for which were at present vested in the treaty, the native Christians should be left to erect their own editions.

It has been ordered at Moscow that in all public buildings the doors of the main entrances shall open outwards, instead of, as hitherto, inwards. The reason of this arrangement is to enable people to have free egress in the event of any accident or panic occurring.

At the sitting of the French Academy of Sciences, last week, M. Costa, the secretary, mentioned that he had received a mass of letters announcing what were called "infallible receipts" for the cholera—more or less absurd; one, for instance, that "the patient should be enveloped in a blanket of new wool, and must be sentenced to the sting of a fowl, very hot."

MALVERN COLLEGE.—The VACATION EXAMINATION will begin on WEDNESDAY, the 11th inst. Candidates will be received for the following Classes:—WEDNESDAY, the 11th. For information, apply to the Rev. GAS WITHOUT HEAT, SMOKE, or SMELL.
Although the advantages of Gas are now so generally acknowledged that its use is almost universal, there are many cases in which, while aware of its excellence, we can not take down it into the rooms for fear of the heat, smoke, and smell. These objections are removed by carrying off the heated air of the room itself, and introducing a current of fresh air in its place.
In addition to the above, we have introduced a mode of lighting, so that gas escapes into the room, as does the heat and smell of the burnt gas, which is carried off by the ventilating flue.

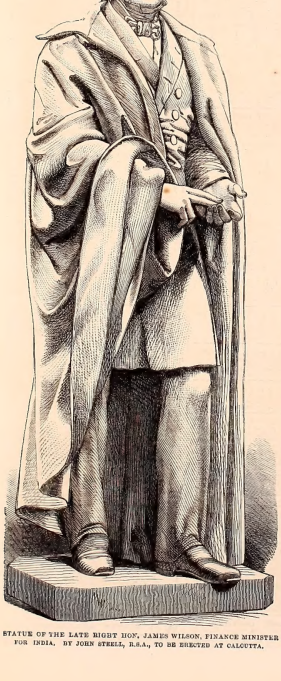
BUST OF THE LATE MR. BUNNING, CITY ARCHITECT.



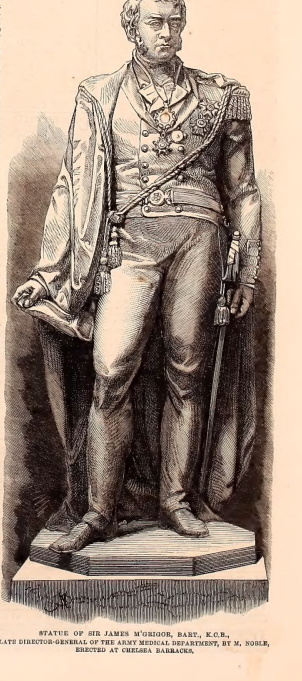
A MEMORIAL tablet and bust have been erected in the western entrance-hall of the City of London School, in honour of the late Mr. Bunning, City architect, whose professional services to the Corporation began with his design for that building. It was inaugurated by the Lord Mayor, some weeks ago, on the occasion of the anniversary of the school. The monument consists of a white Carrara marble bust, placed on a Gothic pedestal of the same material, on which is the inscription. It has a projecting cornice of sculptured foliage, and care has been taken to use only such mouldings as are to be found in the ornamentation of the school itself. The features are easily recognisable by those acquainted with Mr. Bunning, more especially in the earlier period of his career; and although the sculptor, Mr. Joseph Durham, was obliged to depend upon a photograph and upon recollection for guidance, he has given to this production of his skill an excellent likeness and a thoughtful and pleasing expression. The tablet bears the following inscription, by Mr. E. N. Philipps, selected from others by the Lord Chief Baron:—"Erected by the Corporation of London, as a tribute of respect to the memory of James Bunstone Bunning, Esq., F.S.A., who designed this school, and for upwards of twenty years was the City architect. He maintained through life a character for high professional talent, and left behind him an unblemished reputation and an honoured name. Born Oct., 1802; died, Nov. 1863."

BUST OF THE LATE MR. BUNNING, CITY ARCHITECT, BY JOSEPH DURHAM, F.S.A., ERECTED AT THE CITY OF LONDON SCHOOL.

STATUE OF THE LATE RIGHT HON. JAMES WILSON, AT CALCUTTA.

A STATUE of the late Right Hon. James Wilson, one of the Secretaries of her Majesty's Treasury, and sometime Secretary to the Finance Department of the Government of India, has been executed by Mr. John Steell, R.S.A., and her Majesty's sculptor for Scotland. Shortly after the melancholy death of Mr. Wilson, whose great administrative abilities had just begun to tell on the financial affairs of India when he was prematurely taken away, a subscription was entered into among the merchants of Calcutta for a memorial which should express the public sense entertained of his brief but valuable services. It was resolved that the memorial should be in the form of a marble statue, and a committee of gentlemen in Liverpool were requested to employ an artist who would be likely to do full justice to the work. Mr. John Steell, R.S.A., her Majesty's sculptor for Scotland, had already executed from life a bust of Mr. Wilson for the Royal Scottish Academy. He had also produced for Calcutta an admirable statue, also in marble, of the late Marquis of Dalhousie, as a memorial of his distinguished rule as Governor-General. To him, therefore, the commission for a full-length statue of Mr. Wilson was given; and he has performed his task, as our Illustration will show, with remarkable success. The figure is a little larger than life, and has been cut from a fine block of Carrara marble. Mr. Wilson is represented in the act of expounding some of his schemes, and the expression of the face conveys the idea that he has just put forward some argument, and is pausing to observe its effect on those to whom he speaks. The attitude is erect, the left foot slightly advanced, and over the shoulders is loosely thrown a cloak, which falls in graceful folds behind.

STATUE OF THE LATE RIGHT HON. JAMES WILSON, FINANCE MINISTER FOR INDIA, BY JOHN STEELL, R.S.A., TO BE ERECTED AT CALCUTTA.



STATUE OF THE LATE SIR JAMES M'GRIGOR.

THE statue of the late Sir James M'Grigor, Bart., K.C.B., Director-General of the Army Medical Department, of which we give an Illustration, is from the studio of Mr. Noble, and is admirable, both as a work of art and as a faithful and pleasing likeness. We may also congratulate the committee on having secured for it a most appropriate site, fronting the newly-erected barracks of the Guards at Chelsea, with the hospital in the rear, where a few old veterans still linger and talk over the storm of Badajoz and the graves of the Peninsular; and where it will fitly perpetuate the memory of one whose whole life was spent in the service of the soldier, and whose aim and reward was the simple performance of his duty.

A short memoir of Sir James M'Grigor, whose unobtrusive but useful services, extending over sixty years, raised him, unaided by influence, to the highest post in his profession, may not be uninteresting. He was a native of Aberdeen, and entered the Army, as surgeon of the 88th (or Connaught Rangers), in 1793. The scene of his first experience was in Holland, under the Duke of York; then in the West Indies, where the yellow fever was decimating our troops. His next tour of service was to Ceylon and Bombay, whence he crossed the desert with Sir D. Baird's force to join the army under Sir R. Abercrombie in Egypt, a campaign memorable as the first in which a gleam of success dawned on the British arms. There his administrative energy and medical experience successfully overcame the ravages of the plague, which threatened the very existence of the army; and it was his good fortune to make the acquaintance of Baron Larrey, the surgeon-in-chief to the French army, a man of kindred spirit with his own, and as much distinguished for his talents as for his humanity. Between these two men the only rivalry was which could most alleviate the sufferings entailed by war and extend the resources of medical science. After a few years of home service, though by no means of inactivity, Sir James was specially called on to undertake the charge of the hospitals at Walcheren, where fever had stricken down the greater part of the English troops: even into this gloomy scene of suffering his administrative capacity, aided by the most devoted services of the whole medical staff, introduced method and comparative relief; and the evidence he afterwards gave before the House of Commons, on the Walcheren inquiry, was both so lucid and instructive, and also so modest and dignified, that his value was at once recognised, and when the Duke of Wellington wrote from Spain that it was necessary for "the most active and intelligent officer to be sent out," Sir James M'Grigor was unhesitatingly selected. There the Duke intrusted to him the unfettered direction of the arrangements for the sick and wounded, and it is hardly too much to say that by his methodical organisation many thousands were restored to the ranks who would otherwise have been lost to subsequent battles; and that thus he contributed, in his degree, to those marvellous victories which are the pride and glory of British history, and amply justified the wisdom of his appointment and the confidence of his great commander. For was the Duke slow to acknowledge his merits; for he paid to him this singular tribute of praise, the more remarkable as coming from one so calm and reserved as was the Duke of Wellington:—"I consider (he wrote to Lord Bathurst) Mr. M'Grigor one of the most able of public servants."

The Peninsular War over, with its fatigues, its dangers, its anxieties, its glories, Sir James became the Director General of the Army Medical Department, over which he presided nearly forty years, introducing many improvements and raising the standard of medical efficiency. He attracted to the service men of a higher social position and more scientific attainments. It might be supposed that a life of such uninterrupted activity, many years of which were spent in scenes of danger and anxiety, would leave little time for study. But Sir James was the author of several most useful works. He also founded a museum at Chatham and two institutions for the benefit of the widows and children of medical officers. His eminent services were appreciated by the country; he was created a Baronet and Knight Commander of the Bath; he was a member of the Royal Society and other scientific bodies, and three times Rector of the University of Aberdeen. The personal attachment of the officers of his own department was evinced by the presentation to him of a valuable service of plate; a portrait (by Wilkie), placed in the museum at Chatham; another presented to Lady M'Grigor, with a feeling address, at the time of his retirement from office. He died, in 1858, at the ripe age of eighty-eight; and we are happy to think that this monument will perpetuate the memory of so useful and laborious a public servant, and stimulate, we trust, younger men to walk in the same path of simple duty.

This statue has been erected by subscription among the military and medical friends of the late Director-General — Surgeon-Major Wyatt, of the Coldstream Guards, having originated the subscription, and being the honorary secretary and treasurer of the committee.

No. 1341.—VOL. XLVII. SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 4, 1865. WITH A SUPPLEMENT, FIVEPENCE.

THE ITALIAN ELECTIONS.

A GENERAL election, even in an old Constitutional country, is always attended with more or less public anxiety. One can never calculate with certainty what will be its issue. An unforeseen occurrence, either on the eve or during the progress of one, may so impress the popular mind, then in its highest state of susceptibility, as to bring about results of the most unlooked-for character, and may substitute for an expected verdict upon a course of Ministerial policy one which may put in peril national institutions. We have not been without grave experience of this kind even in England. Is it surprising, then, that all who desire the success of Constitutional government on the Continent should fix upon Italy at this moment a wistful gaze? The youthful kingdom, whose birth we hailed with sympathising joy but a very few years since, has been passing through the severe ordeal of reconstituting its Chamber of Deputies. Its first Chamber, elected under the auspices of Count Cavour, fulfilled its arduous mission with a wisdom, self-command, and patriotism which, considering its inexperience, reflected no little credit upon the country. Exposed to serious dangers on either hand, it pursued, steadily and cautiously, a policy of singular moderation and good sense through more than one political crisis in which a false step might have conducted to ruin. The Second Chamber, it was generally felt, would be returned under conditions somewhat more trying to the character of the constituencies. The flush of patriotic enthusiasm has had time to die away. The sacrifices exacted in support of the unity and political independence of Italy have been considerable, while the advantages expected to be secured by them are but very partially developed. The burdens of the people have been increased, while the fruition of their hopes is still in the future. It was an anxious question, therefore, how far the new elections would confirm the general policy adhered to by the first Chamber, and the more so because they would take place under an Administration which, whatever may be its recommendations, has failed to draw to itself the confidence of the public.

The present Government of Victor Emmanuel appeared to be satisfied that the heart of Italy was sound and might be trusted. At all events, they decided that the issue of the elections should not be shaped by the use of official influence. Whether, owing to the unopportune resignation of Marquis Pepoli, the Minister of the Interior, and of Zini, the Under-Secretary for that department, they made a virtue of necessity, or whether they acted upon deliberate choice, the fact should be taken account of in any estimate we may form of the general result. That having abstained from the employment of the machinery at the command of every Constitutional Government was unusual, and their ostentation of it may have tended to chill the ardour of their friends. At the same time, it should be borne in mind that electoral organisation is as yet extremely rude and inefficient in all parts of Italy, with the exception, perhaps, of Piedmont, and that no political party was sufficiently conversant with electioneering tactics to take full advantage of the inaction of the Government. So far, therefore, as the constituencies are qualified to give adequate utterance to the will of the country they may be held to have done so on the present occasion. The voice they have expressed is their own, and fairly embodies their uppermost thought. The judgment they have pronounced has been swayed by no systematic pressure, save it of illicit combinations or of terror. Any verdict cannot be said to have been prompted by extraneous authority but fairly represents the light which is within them.

The process of election in Italy differs materially from that with which Englishmen are familiar. Whereas with us an election at an electoral district obtains a third of the votes on the register or a half of the votes actually tendered, the election is considered incomplete, and a second trial is resorted to in the following week, at which a bare majority suffices to secure success. It is perhaps, rather a matter of regret than of surprise that in a newly enfranchised kingdom the exercise of the suffrage is neither so appreciated as a privilege nor recognised as a duty by a sufficiently large proportion of those to whom it has been accorded a second election an exceptional necessity. The fact that less than one third of the four hundred and forty-three deputies to be chosen were definitively elected on the first trial seems to imply that popular enthusiasm and interest have risen to an extravagant height, or that party feeling was not so keen, or party strength so evenly balanced as to have given rise to a general belief that every vote would be of value. We, who look on from a distance, may have regarded the issue as more uncertain, and may have attached to it more importance, than they with whom the decision rested. Possibly, their local information precluded doubt in a large number of cases, and where the end is clearly foreseen there is apt to be a less strenuous effort in the use of the means whereby it must be achieved.

The general result of the elections, it may be confidently assumed, will be accepted by the wisest and most disinterested friends of Italy, both in the kingdom and out of it, as proof that she understands her position, and is resolved to walk warily. A large a proportion as two thirds of the deputies returned, we are told, belong to the party of moderate Liberals, and will support the Government. No one who has intelligently watched the course of events in the southern peninsula can be at a loss to interpret this fact. It means that the Italian people deliberately ratify the Convention of September, 1864, and intend to see its engagements loyally fulfilled: that the Romans relieved from the restraint imposed upon them by the French army of occupation, shall be left to deal with the temporal sovereignty of the Pope in their own strength; that they shall neither be stimulated into revolt nor aided in it by external force; and that Rome shall not be incorporated with the kingdom of Italy, except in be brought about by mutual agreement. It means that, for the present at least, the Government at Florence will not seek an armed encounter with Austria for the possession of Venetia: that it will not precipitate its claims to that province by means likely to drag Europe into the contest: that it will patiently abide the natural ripening of present political tendencies into the inevitable result: and will pursue its affairs in the confident expectation that nature and justice will ere long put an end to an anomaly which affronts both. And, by logical inference, it means that the resources of the kingdom shall not be meanwhile drained to the limits of exhaustion for the maintenance of naval and military armaments beyond the present need, and above the real strength, of the most youthful of European Powers; that some attempt shall be made to lighten the weight of taxation, to increase the revenue by developing industrial and commercial enterprise, and to reduce to order the national finances, just now in a dangerous state of embarrassment. In a word, it means that, withdrawing her attention from day-dreams of territorial expansion, Italy will devote her energies to immediate and pressing duties, ensure security of both life and property within her own borders, and overtake as speedily as possible the immense arrears of legislation and administration which centuries of misrule and discord have bequeathed to the present generation.

We say that the recent elections fairly indicate that the public opinion of Italy not only favours this programme, but has deliberately indorsed it as dictated by the truest patriotism. The voice of the nation is for going forward, but for going forward under the guidance of good sense and self-restraint. There is no hankering after bygone days. The reactionary party, notwithstanding the utmost exertion, has succeeded in returning to the Chamber but an insignificant fraction of representative power. The party of action, who would precipitate her undertakings which the majority of the people desire, and who fancy nothing has been done whilst more remains to be achieved, have been more successful, but remain still a very decided minority. They reflect the passionate yearnings rather than the calm judgment of the Italian people, and, with the active position, brought into prominent relief by the elections, shows that the intellect of Italy is master of her feeling. Not the indifference of her will, but the clearness and robustness of her understanding, must be taken to have governed her decision. She has proved herself equal to that highest of conquests—the conquest of her own heart.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

The Empress has written a letter of condolence to Lady Palmerston.

The Empress's visit to the hospitals has excited universal admiration among all classes of the population. The humane and courageous conduct of the illustrious lady, suffering as she had been for some days from a severe cold, will long be remembered. The Journal des Débats, alluding to the Empress's visit, says:—

The emotion was great, as might be expected, among all these poor people, and the gentleness of the Empress could not have been more touching. Of the sufferers, whose sight was perhaps already obscured by the gravity of his state, having replied to a question put to him by the Empress, "Oui, ma mère," "My friend," said the Sister of Charity in attendance, "it is not I who speak to you; it is the Empress." "Ah, pardon, madame," replied the Majesty, "it is the most noble name he can give me!"

The Archbishop of Paris, accompanied by his Archdeacons, has visited the Hopital la Charité, where a great improvement has taken place in the condition of the patients. The Prelate did not confine himself to merely performing the customary visit appertaining to his calling, but left substantial marks of his bounty to the more necessitous among the sick.

The zeal and devotion which the medical directors of the two principal hospitals, the Hôtel Dieu and Lariboisière, during the visitation of cholera have received a suitable recognition at the hands of the Emperor. On Tuesday the Minister of the Interior, M. Rouher, the Hôtel Dieu and the Hopital Beaujon, and presented the cross of the Legion of Honour to MM. Laugier and Gosselin, the surgeons. The same honour will, it is believed, be conferred upon the Viscountess de Chabrol, Sister of the sacred Perfect of Toulon, who, at the risk of her own life, repeatedly visited the cholera wards of her district when the plague was at its height, that she might restore moral courage to a panic-stricken population.

Baron Hubner, the newly-appointed Ambassador of Austria to the Papal Court, has arrived in Paris from Rome. He left on Saturday last week. It is asserted that France will exercise her influence with the Papal Government to induce Baron Hubner to remain at Rome.

Count Wickenburg has been appointed President of the Austrian Central Commission for the Exhibition of 1867, which he has held at Paris in 1867. The committee is placed under the immediate patronage of the Archduke Maximilian.

The distribution of rewards for the French national shooting competition took place, on Sunday, at Vincennes. The prize of honour was gained by M. Vagneur, jun., and Master of Cadets, son of the late M. Victor Bailly. That awarded for the longest distance was carried off by M. Jules Gerard.

The Moniteur announces that Russia and Prussia have accepted the invitation of France to the international conference at Constantinople.

A waterspout which burst near the River Ardèche has caused great destruction.

The Emperor Napoleon has conferred a commandership in the Legion of Honour on the Secretary to Sandwich, which promulgates a sort of French protectorate, as an ally and neighbour of the Anand dependency of this Empire.

The Opinion Nationale of Monday evening publishes a correspondence from Oran, dated the 24th of October, which states that the Algerian insurgents, 50,000 strong, are in possession of the whole south side of the Tell Mountains.

SPAIN.

From Madrid we have the gratifying intelligence that Spain has announced to our Government her resolution to adopt energetic measures to put an end to the Cuban trade.

Prince Amadeus of Italy has been decorated by the Queen with the Grand Cross of Charles III.

The cholera is decreasing in Madrid and also in Seville.

ITALY.

The elections for deputies to the Parliament have terminated. The following will be the strength of the parties in the Chamber:—Moderates, 264; Democrats, 101; Clericals, 11; Civil Right, 9; doubtful, 46.

The frigates Gomez and Eldorado have left Toulon for Civita Vecchia, to bring home French troops. Letters from Rome state that the second division of troops will leave that spring, and the remainder of the French army of occupation subsequently. General Kanzler has been appointed Minister of War in the place of Gen. de Mezzacapo, who, it is officially announced, has been relieved of his functions on account of ill-health.

SWITZERLAND.

The National Council engaged, yesterday, in the revision of the Swiss Constitution has adopted two important principles—liberty of conscience and the free exercise of religious worship.

PRUSSIA.

An Imperial decree has been published announcing that the Emperor has appointed a new committee for the control of the public debt. This committee will be in direct communication with the Emperor.

GERMANY.

Bavaria, Saxony, and House Darmestadt have agreed to propose in the Federal Diet that the Holstein estates should be convoked, that Schleswig should be incorporated with Germany, and that the costs of the federal execution in the duchies and of the Danish war should be borne by the Confederation.

The general meeting of the National Verein took place in Frankfort on Sunday, when the following resolutions of the committee in reference to the political organisation of Germany and the solution of the Schleswig-Holstein question were agreed to by a large majority:—

1. The National Verein maintains its original programme, that Germany should be constituted as a federal state, the central authority of which should be transferred to Prussia, upon condition that such transfer be sanctioned by a parliament representing the whole German nation.

2. The National Verein declares that the settlement of the Schleswig-Holstein question can be brought about solely by a vote of the population of the duchies, the free exercise of which can only be limited by the common interests of Germany.

It was further resolved that, should a German central authority not be formed, Prussia alone could effectually defend the northern frontier of Germany. In conclusion, the National Verein resolved that the conversion of the Schleswig-Holstein Estates could no longer be delayed.

DENMARK.

At a sitting of the Committee of the Rigsraad, held last Saturday, the President of the Ministry declared that the Government could not accept the amendments to the Constitution which had been voted by the Rigsraad, and that it would maintain the bill for the Constitution as at first presented to that body by the Government. The Committee will again endeavour to modify the constitutional amendments so as to render them more in conformity with the Government bill.

SWEDEN.

The Swedish Diet has been opened with a speech from the Throne. His Majesty said:—

Swedish and Norwegian arms have enjoyed the blessings of peace in variable, and in part deplorable, circumstances. The relations of my Government to all Powers are friendly, and I entertain no doubt that the fiftieth anniversary of the union of Sweden and Norway has been celebrated with acclamation in both countries, by which the ties of brotherly affection have been more closely knitted. The Swedish Army has been reorganised by a measure previously appointed for the purpose. Your first labour will be to examine the Budget for the reform of the Army. I trust that you will find that honourable task in free will and independent action, and, by accepting the proposals, will have laid a foundation for such conditions adequate to the object, New bankrupt, criminal, and several laws will next be submitted for your consideration, but the number of other main questions of legislation must not be hurried. Bills of less extensive scope only will therefore be laid before you in the present session. As a new composition of the Riksdag is intended in accordance with the Constitutional Law, the existing Riksdag will be limited solely to the most necessary extraordinary expenses for one year. Should the estimate made prove insufficient, the Government will, in the meantime, propose the means of further supplies. I have been refreshed, both in body and mind, by the reverence with, nevertheless, cover the anticipated outlay. Friends for the reorganisation of the army and fleet await completion, and the sums required for these purposes will be asked for subsequently. The liberation of trade has proved beneficial, and the best advantages and credit banks have been advantageous.

The speech concluded with a promise that educational arrangements should be improved, and dwelt emphatically upon the importance to both countries of the Swedish and Norwegian lines of railway communication being speedily completed.

GREECE.

There is another Ministerial crisis at Athens. The Ministry having resigned, the King instructed M. Balgaris to form one. The latter would not undertake it unless Count Sponneck, his Majesty's Danish adviser, left the country. The King refused to comply with this condition, and M. Balgaris declined the task of constituting a Ministry. Greece is at present, therefore, without a Government.

UNITED STATES.

The reconstruction policy of President Johnson is daily gaining support. Besides the Legislatures of Mississippi and South Carolina, that also a Republican Rectification Assembly, had been held, at both of which the Governor's policy was indorsed. The former negro suffrage was denounced. Mr. Wendell Phillips, however, has made a speech, in which he said that President Johnson, in his address to the South Carolina Assembly, had committed himself to the reconstruction rebels, making himself three quarters rebel in order that the South might be one quarter free. Mr. Phillips denounced the indictment of the President's policy by the Republican Conventions.

Mr. Secretary Seward has arrived at Auburn, on the 20th ult., at which he said the settlement of national claims would be conducted without unnecessary irritation, with dignity and honour. He called attention to the influence of America on the international conduct of other States, and said that the Government of the future would be pacific. Previous to the civil war. He expected to see republican institutions, which had been established throughout the American continent, speedily vindicated, reserved, and reinvigorated. He trusted that we should look for signs of its working on other continents.

By a Prussian law, passed in 1844, no divorce causes can be heard until the clergyman of the parish in which the unhappy couple live has had an opportunity of reconciling them to each other. In the year 1861 there were 7266 couples who wished to part, and of these no less than 3778 were induced by the clergymen to give up their unsuitable intentions.

The youthful King of Bavaria is suffering from a disease of the right foot, brought on by too rapid growth. He is obliged to exercise it a little up to the knee, and to wear a bandage, and has been ordered out of Munich by his physicians and doctor's commands for some weeks' residence in the mountains. He enjoys perfect health in every other respect.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

Parliament was on Wednesday further prorogued to the 23rd inst. The proceedings were of a purely formal character.

The 112th session of the Society of Arts will begin on Wednesday, the 18th inst., when the opening address will be delivered by Mr. Warren, F.G.S., chairman of the council.

The opening conversazione of the Architectural Association of London took place yesterday week, when the chair was taken by the president, Mr. R. W. Bahs, who, after distributing the prizes awarded to the various successful students, delivered an able address to a numerous audience.

A sum of upwards of £20,000 has been subscribed towards the cathedral which it is proposed to erect in London to the memory of the late Cardinal Wiseman. The Pope has contributed towards the memorial a magnificent silver gilt monstrance of the same size and with the same precious stones and with appropriate medallions in mosaic.

On the Lambeth Marsh branch line of the North London Railway, extending from Dalston-lane to Broad-street, was formally inspected by a party of directors and other gentlemen, on Tuesday, by special train, and the line was opened on Wednesday. Passengers from Camden Town to the City will in a considerable number of cases save time.

At the last meeting of the committee of management of the Hospital for Consumption and Diseases of the Chest at Brompton some interesting special business was transacted—viz., the selection from the list of candidates of twenty of the most eligible cases to proceed to Madeira, where they will remain the whole of the winter. The party will sail from London on Monday next.

On Wednesday the winter session of the Royal School of Naval Architecture and Marine Engineering, South Kensington, in connection with the Science and Art Department of the Committee of Council on Education, was opened. Last Saturday the friends of Professor Masson, of University College, entertained him at a farewell dinner, previous to his proceeding to Edinburgh, where he has been appointed Professor of Rhetoric and Belles Lettres. Mr. Stanfield, M.P., was in the chair. Several wishes were expressed for the success of Professor Masson, to which he made a suitable reply.

A great pile of warehouses on the Surrey side of the Thames, known as Stuart's Quay, was on Monday night destroyed by fire, the property of, or tenanted by, Messrs. Stuart, who on Monday morning had insured their stock to the amount of £100,000, was consumed.—A great fire also occurred on Saturday night in the Kent Road, by which a number of cows were recorded last week—one in Bermondsey, where a married woman was burnt to death; and another at Stepney, where a child was run over and killed. The other inmates of the house destroyed were rescued.—An artistic brushmaker, named Jones, living in Hackney, committed suicide on Sunday by the fire, left the room, and on his return, finding it in a blaze, was so elated that he fell down dead.

On Monday morning the three new divisions of police which have for some time been in course of formation, and which are to be under Mayne, the Chief Commissioner of the Metropolitan Police, began their duties. The three new divisions are to be known as the T, the A, and the X divisions. The first, which will comprise Clapham and Brixton, will be under the superintendence of Mr. Bond; that of the X, which will be in Hammersmith, Chiswick, Kentish Town, and Somers Town; and that of the A division, under Mr. Hosey, will include Paddington, Kilburn, Hampstead, Highgate, Finchley, and the Harrow road. The number of men comprised in the three new divisions will be 1,000, including superintendents, inspectors, and sergeants.

The Rev. S. Haddon Parkes states, in a letter to the Times, that the plan of the new parish which he has formed for the purpose of his diocesan for the working classes of London have been distributed in the following manner:—"The whole plateau has been divided into districts, each station in thirty rectangular parishes; 3180 have been found their way into thirteen working men's clubs (two have been opened for the reception of twenty schools—ragged, Sunday, and parochial; 1180 among the soldiers of the garrison; 1000 have been sent to the various hospitals; 1000 have been in attendance at the various theatres, and other minor places have had their applicants. The 19,866 pamphlets have found their way to the poor of London. At least eighty people have thrown themselves of their own accord in my way, and confessed upon them, and there can be no doubt that, morally and socially, great good will result from this well-timed gift."

On Tuesday night all the toll bars and gates on 108 miles of road on the south side of the Thames—comprising all the main roads—were taken over by the Metropolitan Board of Works, and the Surrey Commercial Docks Company, the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, the Kingston, and Stockwell, fifty-eight miles of the former trusts were cleared a few days ago. Those of an advantageous character, as the Kingston and Kew-green gate to Greenwich, Lewisham, and Farnborough, Beckenham, Croydon, Brixton, and Peck'ham and Camberwell, Deptford, and Rotherhithe, &c., like manner, made free, and so were those of Bermondsey, Rotherhithe, and Deptford. The gates removed were all of the most inconvenient character, and were, from fifty-five miles. These ordinary results are in great measure due to the exertions of Mr. Thomas Dyke Acland, M.P., Mr. Ayrton, M.P., and Mr. Locke, M.P., the latter having also been appointed chairman of the committee of the Board. Mr. W. Jackson, M.P., Mr. Matthew Forster, late M.P. for Berwick, and Mr. Hermann Ingram, M.P., and Lord Lovaine (late Lord Percy, and late Member M.P. for Middlesex), and on the south side, of the late Sir Joseph Paxton, Mr. John Locke, M.P., Mr. A. H. Layard.

The South-Eastern Industrial Exhibition was opened last Saturday in Guy's Hospital, Borough-road Hospital, in the presence of the Lord Chancellor, Viscount Sydney, Lord Lieutenant of Kent, and a large number of visitors. The various articles, to the number of 4,000, which are exhibited are immediately beneath the Painted Hall. Many of the articles are of a serious character, some displaying remarkable ingenuity and mechanical skill. They are divided into five classes—professional workmanship, amateur productions, articles of domestic and miscellaneous manufacture, fine arts, and objects, inventions and novel contrivances, ladies' work, and miscellaneous. Models of ships and guns form a notable feature in the exhibition, and there are also more amateur paintings and works of art than are generally to be met with. A working model of the Victoria Bridge at Rochwich has excretted largely on the occasion. The prizes for competition are numerous, and are of a valuable character, consisting principally in addition to a silver medal, of the exhibition will be presented to each exhibitor. The Rev. Dr. Rowsell, secretary to the Hospital, and Mr. Thomas Norman Deane, have taken great interest in the exhibition, and the committee express themselves deeply indebted to the Admiralty for providing them with a hall in which to display the productions of the ingenious science to them to have the opening ceremony in the Painted Hall.

A gasometer on the works of the London Gaslight Company, in Stone Buildings, contains a million cubic feet of gas, capable of storing more, and a large building, called the "meter-house," near the gasometer, was completely filled with meters, filling up every inch of space between the arches, some of whom are not expected to survive. Horses in the neighbourhood, and in the stables of the company, were also suffering from the fumes in many instances, the fortitude of the animals in bearing the foul gas meters were filled with gas when No. 1 exploded with the sound of a park of artillery, shaking the whole meter-house from end to end, and filling it with flame. The second gasometer caught fire and burnt with great fury; but to greater exhaustion were from this—from a cause not yet ascertained—the loss of gas. Within a very short time about thirty men were got out of the place, but all were more dead and as quickly as possible. Every effort at once to be identified, and the divers were taken at once to St. Thomas's Hospital. Some were only slightly injured, and were able to return to their homes; but wounds or bruises ensued; but with about a dozen the case was different, and they were carried to the hospital, where they were under the care of the evening students. Two men were found, unable to escape, and were suffocated at that time had perished. Those who saw the explosion describe it as one vast upheaving of flame shooting high in the air, and the whole place was instantly filling around. People nearly a mile off were thrown violently down, and persons who were in houses in streets at some distance from the works were seven times from the heat of the flames. The flames, indeed, mounted so high that even though it was four miles off, the glare was distinctly seen in the west from long distances.

A meeting of the Royal National Life-boat Institution was held, on Thursday, at its house, Sahn-street, Adelphi, Admiral Sir Sidney Dacres in the chair. Mr. Lewis, the secretary, reported that during the past month there had been many distressing shipwrecks on the coast. But frequently, as well as death and despair, there was also heroism in the life-boat crews to make the scenes memorable. The institution voted £12 to the crew of some of its life-boats for saving the following shipwrecked crews during the fearful gales of last month:—The Caister life-boat saved the brig Kathleen, of Hartlepool, and her crew of six men; and the brig Harlington, of Sunderland, and her crew of nine men: the Newbiggin life-boat saved the crew of two men from the sloop Robert Hood, of Newcastle-on-Tyne, and also the crew of six men from the schooner Thistle, of Sunderland: the crew of five men from the Prussian schooner Patriot, of Barth; the Margate life-boat saved the crew of seven men from the brig Ann, of Sunderland: the Brighton life-boat rendered important services to the brig Ringdove, of Whitby, and her crew of seven men, which were saved by the Shoreham boat from the Dungeness Lighthouse, who landed them at Rye: the Eastbourne life-boat rendered great service to the steam-ship Preston Belle, of Dublin; the Wexford life-boat rescued the crew of the brig Alice, of Sunderland: North Shields' the Hayling Island life-boat saved the crew of fourteen men from the barque Lady Lorne, of Sunderland: the abandoned Norwegian barque into Portsmouth Harbour: the Richmond, Yorks, life-boat rescued the crew of the brig Ann, of Sunderland: the Belfast: the Pooling life-boat saved the crew of six men of the schooner Ann, of Sunderland: the Lytham, Brighton life-boat saved the crew of five men of the schooner Earl Cotland, of Ambech. The silver medal of the institution, for the gallantry of the crew of the Lytham life-boat in saving the crew of the schooner Earl Cotland, of Ambech. And £15 to the crew, accompanied by the silver medal of the institution, for the gallantry of the crew of the coast of their gratuitous efforts in rescuing the crew of the coast of the French brig Providence, of Granville, which had gone ashore on Hayle Bar, in a strong wind and heavy ground sea, on the 19th ult. Rewards amounting to £141 were also voted to pay the expenses of many of the life-boats for the services rendered by them during the past month, their services were not, however, required, the vessels having, in most cases, got off themselves. Various other awards were also voted to the crews of life-boats. Payments amounting to £1079 were ordered to be made on various life-boats belonging to the institution, and the sum of £1000 was contributed to the institution during the past month by Mrs. Colonel Vernon, in memory of her late husband, Colonel Vernon, of Hanbury Hall, Worcestershire, and of Shipbrook, in Cheshire. Mr. Peter Bell, Esq., of the Life Guards, who died last month the institution had sent new life-boats to Caistor, new Great Yarmouth, and Cullercoats, Northumberland. A life-boat is on the way to Caistor, was fortunately the means of saving a vessel and her crew.

THE LATE POLICE-CONSTABLE.—Consequent upon the death of Mr. Justice Cresswell, Mr. Justice Willes, who was the judge on the Home Circuit to which the late Mr. Justice Cresswell belonged, has taken the latter's place, being raised to the Bench by the late Lord Chancellor. The learned judge took his seat in the Court of Queen's Bench on Monday, while he was made a Judge in Michaelmas Term, 1859. He has now served his full term of office, and will be succeeded by Mr. Justice Lush. At the Central Criminal Court, on Thursday week, the German schoolmaster, Jacob Jacobsohn, was indicted for the manslaughter of Louis Jerome, in a fight, striking him with a table-knife, was found guilty of manslaughter, and recommended to mercy by the jury, on account of the provocation which made him fight. He was sentenced to six month's hard labour.

The prisoner Wheeler, who was charged with defrauding foreigners, by advising pedlars and officials of the receipt of imaginary important packages, which could only be obtained by the payment of certain charges, which, when these, have also been tried. Louis Jordan was convicted and sentenced to twelve months' imprisonment. Several other prisoners, against whom charges were acquitted on the belief that she is the wife of the man; Alexander Wheeler, who has been in custody for the last two months, was discharged. He was ordered six years' penal servitude.

At the Central Criminal Court, on Monday night, James Murphy, a salesman in Petticoat-lane, was indicted for the manslaughter of Thomas Young and Jennings, barmaid at the Old Red Lion Tavern, close by. The girl returning to walk out with Young, Murphy, who was drunk, struck her down and began attempting to cut her throat, at which he was "scaring" away, when pulled off by a man who came to her assistance. Young, probably, by a bench the were. The wounds are not at present considered dangerous. The man remains remanded.

At the Westminster Police Court, on Wednesday, Mr. Alfred Wood, proprietor of a boarding-house, 3, Bridge-street, Chelsea, was charged with having stolen £155, a gold watch and chain, and a silver watch, the property of Lord Charles Russell, from his bedroom at the house on the 14th ult. The prisoner was taken from him, in August last, the loan of £5 to pay some bill. The better he got to know him, the more he found him to be unworthy of confidence, and the same evening this poultry was broken into and a much larger sum of money, with two watches, was stolen. The prisoner was remanded.

CARRYING A PRIME MINISTER'S UMBRELLA.—The Scotsman has the following reminiscence of the late Lord Palmerston:—"His Lordship was walking down Pall Mall in very wet weather, and, as usual, without a covering from the rain's pelting, and his silken shawl Westminster Hall, and also because he was being followed by the rain. Palmerston, however, had a stout umbrella were taken in the carriage for the walk home. A Cabinet Minister, who was present, was asked to carry the umbrella. He accepted the office, and the premier's evening, and to their way home. The appearance of the Cabinet Minister with the umbrella, and the premier by his side, but declined to take it off for sure. The Minister then insisted on carrying the umbrella, and the premier would have used it, as a walking-stick, and flourished it at a dress-maker which his baton. In his colleague's hand it was as much a protection to the premier's head as if he were glad to get rid of anything he had been entrapped into carrying; and that, whenever he gave Lord Palmerston an umbrella in the street, he was particularly careful not to offer to carry his umbrella.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON: SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 4, 1865.

THE new Cabinet, if new be the word to apply to a rearranged group of officials, is stated to be complete. The outside world scarcely understands the reason for the delay that has taken place, and thinks that, as soon as the last Cabinet secret that Premier had been paid, the present Premier might have announced his list of colleagues. There was never any doubt as to Lord Granville's taking the Foreign Office, or any of his former associates being prepared to serve under him. If there had been any on the latter point, a semi-official statement removed it, by the declaration that the Ministers had all offered to act in any capacity in which Lord Russell might think that they could be most useful. We do not suppose that this obliging facility of disposition was to be accepted as a literal fact, or that Mr. Gladstone would have taken the Duchy of Lancaster, or the Duke of Somerset have replaced Mr. Cardwell; but it was so clear that the Premier was to be helped in every way, that the delay in giving the list savoured of a certain pomposity and fussiness not particularly admired in England. But, as the lady in "The Vicar of Wakefield," says, "there is a form in these things, Madam; there is a form."

But, supposing all the blanks filled up, and the component parts of the Palmerston Ministry without Lord Palmerston," we apprehend that there will not be much political news, of a domestic kind, until the meeting of Parliament. It may be taken for granted that, as yet, the Ministers have not made up their minds as to what they will do or will not do upon the question which it is sought to force upon them—that of Parliamentary reconstruction. It will be necessary for them, we conceive, to meet this question one way or the other; for—although by no means urged that the middle classes of the country, though by no means indifferent to the second just demands for the franchise, are singularly unimpassioned on the subject, and will require very full information both as to facts and as to the probable results of a change—there is no denying that the Reform question has assumed proportions which forbid its being ignored. Whether Earl Russell will insist upon a large investigation into the subject of the franchise, a process which is adopted with the advantage in regard to all other matters which come under the action of the Legislature that it seems strange to hesitate to apply it in the largest case and the most important, his Lordship may now be considering. He has also several Reform bills of his own, each of which at the time of its preparation he doubtless regarded as Conclusive and satisfactory; and it may be in his mind to forbish up one of these and present it to Parliament as a fulfilment of pledges, if not as a final settlement of claims. Mr. Gladstone has had the opportunity of making some orations at Glasgow, and he has poured forth a flood of eloquence; but, of course, has been permitted to tell nothing, even if he had anything to tell. The sentence which his indulgence to the Scotch Academy are remarkable for the perfect ease and grace with which he avoided saying anything which could be laid hold of, and yet seemed to be pointing on a course of action to his hearers. He was heartily obliged to them for their address, no doubt, and felt more satisfactory than the English habit of saying out in a straightforward way what was meant, for that was the best possible means of keeping rulers enlightened as to the opinions of the people. The speech-making of Scotland is therefore now a most legitimate one for discussion, but there were a great number of various views regarding it, and his advice to his hearers was not to place too much confidence so much in any particular set of men as in the institutions of the country itself. Nothing, surely, could be safer than this. If we are to have a Reform bill we shall be enabled, by the light of Mr. Gladstone's speech on the second reading, to perceive that this Glasgow address meant that the institutions of the country themselves were the machinery for their own renovation; while, should it appear to the Cabinet that England is very prosperous and contented, and that changes are not wanted, on the great subject, Mr. Gladstone will have meant that our institutions as they exist are all-sufficient for our purposes, and that while we have freedom and full pockets we should not have recourse to innovation. Mr. Gladstone could do no more than this, and no one but he is no other Minister who could have executed a difficult task so well. It may be that in his longer speech we seem to perceive the future Prime Minister becoming more apparent, and a certain powerful if hidden tone coming into action. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, whose engagements compelled him to be first in the field, has acquitted himself in masterly style; and Lord Russell should be proud that such a man is willing to call himself a subordinate and to accept a chief.

We may believe that the Cabinet will keep its own secrets on the subject of Reform; but it would, we think, be advantageous to let its decision be known, if that decision be in favour of a full and complete change. At present there is nothing to the franchise, and all the circumstances connected with it, are before us—not in a trustworthy shape, and as statistics carefully gathered and tested, but as party statements got up for a Parliamentary fight. No time should be wasted in close the mouths of all parties hereafter; the masses would be satisfied in having made patent the facts on which they based their claims, even if those claims should not be conceded in full, while the wealthy and educated classes would have had the opportunity of pointing out the dangers which they conceive would be incurred by swamping the representation, even though they might be advised to admit a larger accession of suffrage than they think quite prudent. In fact, to carry out the spirit of Mr. Gladstone's speech at Glasgow, we ought to have the case on both sides fairly and fully made out. The House of Commons itself is no calm court of inquiry, nor are facts to be settled by the force of majorities. Should Earl Russell decide that the most constitutional course is to appoint a Committee, the issue should be submitted to the Committee of the Reform Act, and to report whether any, and what, amendments are required, he would satisfy the best people on both sides of the question, and we could then proceed to our Reform with a conviction that it would be worthy the name.

A Cabinet Council was held last Saturday, and the redistribution of the seats finally determined. Earl Russell succeeds the late Premier, the Earl of Clarendon taking the seat of the Foreign Office; Earl Granville remains President of the Council. In the Lower House Mr. Gladstone will assume the leadership: otherwise there will, for the present, be little or no change. Earl Russell had an audience of the Queen on Sunday, and a second meeting of the Cabinet was held on Monday. The Globe asks that the Government may be treated with forbearance and good-will until it is in a position to lay before Parliament a programme, upon the satisfactory character of which its existence must depend.

Helmore officiated. The Crown Prince and Crown Princess of Prussia dined with the Prince and Princess of Wales, Prince of Glücksburg and other of their Royal Highnesses, and left Marlborough House for the Continent.

On Monday the Prince and Princess took leave of the Prince and Princess, and left Marlborough House for the Continent. The Prince and Princess of Wales, attended by the Hon. Mrs. W. Grey, Lieutenant-General Knollys, and Major Grey left Marlborough House on a visit to the Right Hon. Alexander Wentworth Beaumont. Their Royal Highnesses travelled by the London and North-Western Railway, and arrived at the Huyton station at eight minutes to five o'clock. The Right Hon. Alexander was received by the Lord Derby and Lord Stanley. Their Royal Highnesses drove immediately to Knowsley Park, and the acclamations of a large assembly of people, The route through Liverpool was gaily decorated with flags, triumphal arches, and floral devices. The corporation, in state carriages was drawn up on the lawn, and saluted the Prince and Princess upon their arrival. A large and distinguished party was invited to meet their Royal Highnesses at Knowsley.

On Tuesday the Prince and Princess, accompanied by the Earl and Countess of Derby, left Knowsley at eleven o'clock, in an open landau, drawn by four greys, preceded by outriders. Lieutenant-General Sir John Jones, in full uniform, was in attendance. The numerous guests at Knowsley followed in carriages. The Royal party drove first to Gateacre Park, where they were joined by Earl Sefton's party. The Royal cortège proceeded along the West Derby-road, by Rockyane to the Prince's-park, where, arriving at a quarter to one, they alighted out the entire route their Royal Highnesses were greeted with one continuous shout from the assembled multitude of persons assembled. The utmost enthusiasm prevailed, and nothing occurred to mar the pleasure of the proceedings throughout. The Prince and Princess were received at the landing-stage by the Mayor. The Cunard actually volunteer steamer of Colonel Holden, carrying the Royal personal arms, and the band played "God Bless the Prince of Wales." Their Royal Highnesses and party embarked on board the steamer Wonder, and, which steamed towards the south end, led by the tender Alert. The river was crowded with vessels of various kinds, gaily dressed and filled with spectators. The Prince of Wales's cruise a Royal salute fired from the training-school frigate Conway, the yards being manned. The Prince and Princess frequently acknowledged the cheers of the shores of the lads. The Woodside also steamed past H.M.S. Donegal, the reformatory-ships Akbar and Clarence, and the invariably indefatigable, the yards of each being manned. After passing the Canard steamer Persia, the Wonder returned to the Liverpool pier, and the Royal party landed. The volunteers presented arms and the band played the National Anthem. The Prince and Princess and party drove to the Townhall, where they were entertained at a déjeuner by the Mayor. About eighty guests were present. After the déjeûner the Prince and Princess proceeded to a balcony and viewed the Change, and afterwards drove to the Free Public Library and St. George's Hall, where Mr. W. T. Best played a selection of music upon the grand organ. The Prince and Princess afterwards returned to Knowsley Park. In the evening a grand ball was given at the residence of the Countess of Derby in honour of their Royal guests.

On Wednesday the Prince, accompanied by the Earl of Derby and a large party, passed the day shooting over the Knowsley preserves. The Princess, accompanied by the Countess of Derby and a numerous party, visited the Ravenhead Glassworks, at St. Helens. Her Royal Highness left Knowsley at seven o'clock. The 46th Lancashire Rifle Volunteers and the 2nd Lancashire Engineer Volunteers were drawn up along the route, a large number of persons had assembled. The Princess and party were escorted over the works by Mr. Sullivan, and witnessed the whole process of plate-glass manufacture. The works was practicable. Ravenhead Works are the oldest in the kingdom, and were visited by King George IV. when Prince of Wales.

The Prince and Princess, in accordance with the latest arrangements, would leave Knowsley Park yesterday (Friday), and proceed direct to Sandringham House, where their Royal Highnesses will remain for the shooting season.

The Prince has forwarded a donation of fifty guineas in aid of the funds of the Fishmongers and Poulterers' Asylum, Wood-green, Tottenham, thus becoming a patron of that charity.

CHURCH AND UNIVERSITIES.

On Sunday Oct. 22, Holy Trinity Church, Leeds, was reopened, great improvements having been effected in the interior of the edifice.

The central committee of the Yorkshire Diocesan Church Building and Endowment Aid Society have made a grant of £1000 to the church purposes.

The Bishop of Lincoln has presented the Rev. H. Nelson to the prebendal stall of Biggleswade in Lincoln Cathedral, in acknowledgment of the services which he has rendered to the diocese as principal of the training college for schoolmasters.

The Guardian states that one of the results of the outcry about the "Romanising" practices at St. Michael's, Shoreditch, is that a stranger who attended at one of the services to form his own judgment on the subject had great difficulty to build another church in the parish.

The foundation-stone of a new National Church school and and library was laid at Pendeford, near Bilston, Staffordshire, by the Countess of Wilton. The cost of the building will be about £300, towards which a sum of £200 has been already subscribed or promised.

On Monday the foundation-stone of the new district church of St. Saviour's, Hoxton, was laid by Lord Hatherley, who made a numerous assemblage of the resident gentry and inhabitants. The land upon which the church is to be erected, together with the endowment and schools, has been given by the Earl of St. Germans. The church will contain nearly 1000 sittings. The new incumbent of the district will be the Rev. H. L. Nicholson, one of the preachers at Archbishop Tenison's Chapel.

The Bishop of London has appointed the following gentlemen to be the preachers in St. Paul's Cathedral on Sunday mornings in the present month of November, 1868:—On the 1st, the Rev. Edward Hayes Mortimer, Chaplain to the Lord Mayor, late Head Master of the City of London School; the 8th, the Rev. William Hale Hale, Rector of the parish of Greenwich, and Rural Dean; 15th, the Rev. William Sparrow Simpson, Rector of St. Matthew's, Friday-street, and Minor Canon of St. Paul's; 22nd, the Rev. Robert George Baker, Vicar of All Saints', Fulham, and Rural Dean.

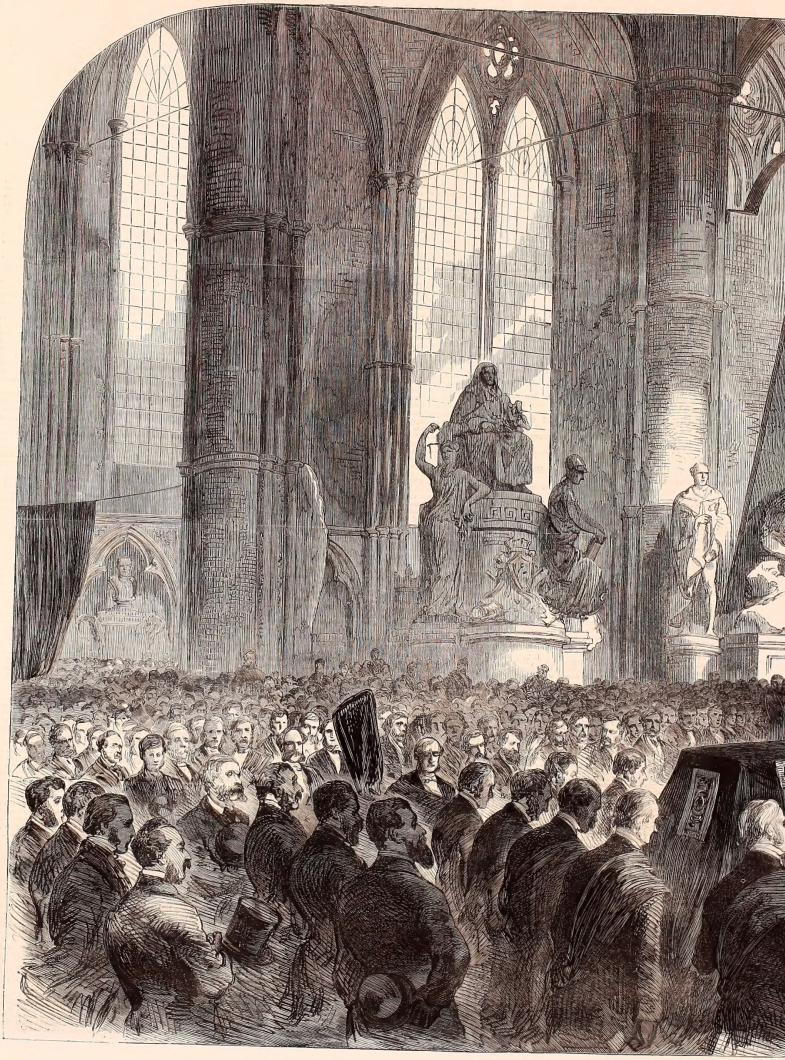
On Thursday last the Bishop of Lincoln consecrated All Saints' Church, which has just been erected on the Consecrated Land Society's estate at Scunthorpe. The church is of beautiful design, but has been only partially carried out, as it is intended to lengthen the sacred edifice when the parish has increased so much as to require the accommodation the enlargement. The church is built on an elevated site in Dowsabire square, at the entrance of the Vicar's parish, and is intended to be the centre of the energy at the west, the Incumbent having Farnley Grove-cum-Ingleton schools under his charge, and the Rev. Canon Hamilton Gell those under his charge have been built, and are of more than 200 in number.

The following preferments and appointments have recently been made:—The Rev. R. Gresnall, Incumbent of Stretton, to be honorary Canon of Chester Cathedral, Archdeacon of Salop, vice Lee, resigned; the George, Barnwell-on-the-Hill, Bedford; Rev. Edward Bickersteth, M.A., Vicar of Christ Church, Hampstead, to be Rector of St. Benet's, Sherehog, with St. Peter's, Paul's Wharf, London; Rev. Thomas Bowdler, P.A. Campbell to Almeley, Herefordshire; Rev. T. H. Cartwright to Braintree; Rev. J. Jeffery, Incumbent of Stadmoor, Westmoreland, to Melton, Cumberland; Rev. C. N. Mann, Rector of Mawgan-in-Meneage with Martin, Cornwall, to St. Issey, near Wadebridge. Incumbencies: Rev. A. C. Adams to Toft, Cheshire; Rev. J. Bateson to Tuddington; Rev. J. C. Boyer to Holy Trinity Episcopal Chapel, Dunfermline, Scotland; Rev. E. L. Cowles to St. Simon's Church, Baptist Mills, Bristol; Rev. T. Johnson to St. Mark's Church, Preston; Rev. R. Lilley to Smallthorne, Tunstall; Rev. R. Rogers, Chaplain to the Nottingham Borough Gaol, to Bunny, Nottinghamshire; Rev. Thomas Scott to Ripon; Rev. J. Shepherd, Yorkshire; Rev. H. Simpson to Sowerby; Rev. J. Tyrer to Glassonby to Ellington; Rev. T. G. Lockock, Domestic Chaplain to Earl Dunmore, to Parish of Milton; Rev. C. E. Norris to St. Mary's, Bilston; Rev. J. Stevenson to Skegness, Lincolnshire; Rev. W. E. Lawrence to be Chaplain of the Bridewell, Bridewell.

ECHOES OF THE WEEK.

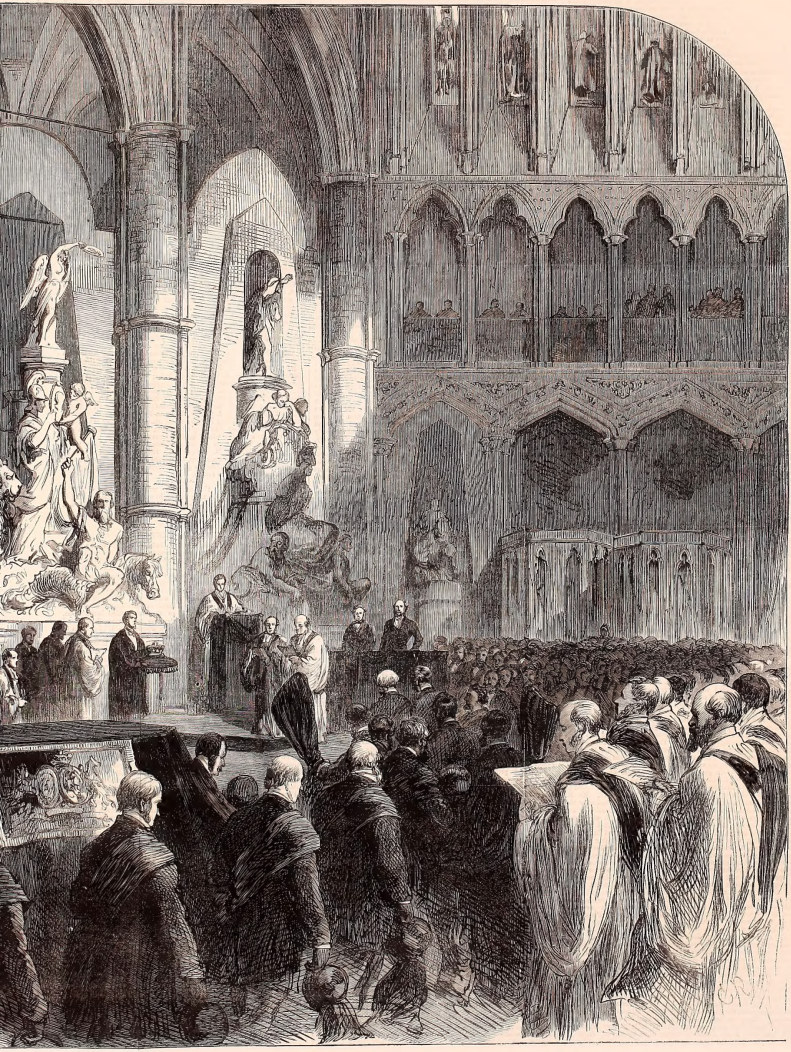
WHERE should a great Englishman who, for more than half a century, has deserved well of his country, and whose renown has spread throughout the world, be buried? The answer is obvious. If he be a warrior or a painter, let his ashes repose in St. Paul's. If he be a man of letters or a statesman, let him lie in Westminster Abbey. There is a fitness in funereal things in the case of Thomas Babington and Joshua Reynolds sleep tranquilly by the side of Nelson and Wellington; and Pitt, and Fox, and Chatham cannot have better companionship in death than Camden and Macaulay. The artist celebrates the exploits of the soldier with his pencil; the poet and the historian preserve the memory of the deeds of the legislator with their pen. For a patriotic Prime Minister, for a great Proconsul, Westminster Abbey is the only appropriate place of sepulture. "With all his faults," writes Lord Macaulay of Warren Hastings, "and they were neither few nor small, he was a great man." Of Clive he exclaims his remains. In that temple of silence and reconciliation where the enmities of twenty generations lie hushed in long repose, the sharp wrangling has during many ages afforded a quiet resting-place to those whose deeds and labours have been the common property of their race. Within Hall, the dust of the illustrious dead should have mingled with the dust of the illustrious accessory. This was not to be, however, in the case of Warren Hastings; and, but for a supposed vow, executed on the last moment, all that was mortal of Henry John Temple, Viscount Palmerston, would have been consigned to the cold embrace of Hampshire.

But, assuming the locality to be granted, how should our great man be buried? That is by no means so easy a question to answer. In days past and gone, when Englishmen lived "by the book," the age is averse to splendour, and state, and pomp. The Prince Consort was laid in the earth with as much ceremony as would have maintained the elegance of a private gentleman. There were no torchbearers, Lord High Stewards with staves, or guests in golden cars. Garter King-at-Arms was there, but without his tabard and proclamation. The private mourners, and the Lord Chamberlain, and the great Duke of Wellington, in 1852, as a garish and unseemly accompaniment. All in a funeral, they say, should be austere and dignified simplicity. So the late generous and true friend of the people, Joseph Hume, the Radical Minister and Knight of the Garter were not half so splendid as those Knights of the Garter who, in the days of the Georges who had his hand blown off while giving instruction in field fortification to a party of volunteers.



I went to the Abbey and had a good view of the ceremonial, but I confess to disliking it. I am not a Radical nor a democrat. I have been bidden to many famous burials, and have become case-hardened to what undertakers call "the last offices." But I am not, for the first time, whose business it is to "perform" funerals in print. Now, the northern bronco paid to Lord Palmerston struck me as being distinctly shabby. I am wish to carry my point, and therefore I will give you at once. I will admit that all funeral pomp is vain, hollow, and empty. Nevertheless, assuming that there is such a thing as propriety of view, the nakedest we return to it the better shall we mingle with the dust of departed ages. Let us, then, have a hearse for a funeral, unreal fails to satisfy even the abstract reasoner. Devoid of magnificence, it is certainly devoid of dignity. One is worse than the other. If we are to discard symbolism altogether, why retain these processions, these mysterious adjuncts of the dead, and that coronet of crimson and ermine which, we know perfectly well, the dead Viscount will never wear in his white coffin? Let us cast out that "horse of plumes," that monstrous tray of feathers, with which the undertaker's man staggers along the nave, and which nods and wags in its ceaseless motion like the idle tail of a Newfoundland dog. What is the good of that? What end does it serve, save to swell the undertaker's bill? Let us get rid of it, or, if we cannot get rid of it, make it "anatomy simple" as they are, are very costly affairs. You may banish the hearse, but the mourning coaches, the carriages and the soldiers—whose appearance, by-the-way, in their brave coats coats excluding; but the "pall" is a mockery, and a pall is nothing but a symbolism shall not be abolished. Perish pomp and parade; but we will continue to revel in "crape of feathers," and in velvet and satin palls, gilt nails, and cherub handles.

The Dean of Westminster is kind as to send me a ticket of admission to the "triforium" on Friday, where, I believe, his own private friends found accommodation; but I had another ticket, for the press gallery, which is placed in the north transept, close to the south transept, and gave my "triforium" pass away to a Doctor of Divinity who is a friend of mine. Yet I should have preferred the "triforium," high above me, perfectly well; and, amongst other things, I will tell you why. Because I should have been provided with his bat on; and one lady sotely reading a newspaper. It appears to me that a lady gallery in Westminster Abbey is as much a part of the cathedral as a stall in the choir. Would people wear their hats and bonnets in a mosque? I wonder!



There was one element of grandeur and simplicity, however, of which not all the ghastly mockeries of the undertaker and all the indecorum of the bereaved, could rob the funeral of Lord Palmerston. The music was magnificent. That pathetic wailing, that not despairing dirge, which tells of hope and faith in a future in my case now; and I never before heard the "Dead March" in Saul" so grandly and with so much effect as on Friday last.

But come we back to the world. The paucity of real erudition in this very metropolis is sometimes startling. Only the other day, I was curiously exemplified than in the number of people who have rushed to the pages of Lucretius to find out the meaning of the expression of "fortuitous concourses of atoms" was not original or borrowed from Dugald Stewart, but was drawn from the Latin of the Roman Poet, through Cicero against Democritus. The sermons of South and Barrow, and Tully's book, "De Natura Deorum," are not now in the world's ken. It is good to be with few books on important discovery of the wellspring of the Palmerstonic locution seem quite to be gone the first time I heard it. Some persons have attributed to Lucretius the "atomic theory of creation" was a stock subject of discussion amongst the Greeks and Romans. Democritus, by the way, who thought he had triumphantly refuted the atomists by pointing out that the sun was not a mass of atoms, but a single fiery substance, in the next generation, another wise man held that atoms were eternal and self-existent, and rejected the idea of a primary factor of gravitation upset theories one and two, and other theorists began on a fresh basis.

This is the season when "dark and distant rumours" of new magazines are heard to rumble in literary ocean and the usual consequences of polished waves and ripples on the unexpected additions to the already formidable array of "mags," which are no mere creatures of the air, but are as substantial as a Bible or a Bradshaw. The first is The Argosy—a very good title, I think; to be edited, it is to be hoped, by a man who has the faculty of selecting such articles as in which ought to be called "The Golden Fleece." I have heard that Mr. Charles Reade is to be a contributor to the Argosy; but the "Cloister and the Hearth" is not in this title. Messrs. Sampson Low, Son, and Co. are the authorized Co. are the publishers. The second new periodical Magazine number two is to be Mr. Frank Buckland's Land and the Water, to be published by Messrs. Strahan and Co., which will be a "Union of Oh" is not its

FINE ARTS.

WINTER EXHIBITION AT THE FRENCH GALLERY, PALL-MALL.

WE remember the occurrence of nothing relating to British art more surprising than that so many works, and generally of so respectable a character, should be collected out of the ordinary "season" as are now on view at the two winter exhibitions—the one in the French Gallery, Pall-mall; the other in the rooms of the Society of British Artists, Suffolk-street. Pall-mall—to say nothing of the forthcoming Winter Exhibition of the Old Water-Colour Society. Nothing could prove more conclusively the insufficiency of the accommodation in the Royal Academy exhibitions, and better evidence could perhaps not be offered of the increased demand for new pictures by the public.

The exhibition at the French Gallery, though numerically small, is generally choice in quality, and contains works by many of our most distinguished painters. As far as we are aware, the contribution to the art-catalogue for the first time, and which is numerously filled by the artists.

Unquestionably, the chief attraction of this gallery is afforded by Mr. G. F. Watts, who has sent three portraits and a cartoon, half-length female study. It is impossible to speak of Mr. Watts's services artistic sensibility in a very high degree; and essentially, or at least show, an intelligent feeling for, if not a uniformly full realisation of, technical qualities which are not less rare in the English school, and are, indeed, only found in perfection in the works of the old masters. Mr. Watts's refined taste and power of design are unquestionably hardly be questioned; but it is in giving material expression to these that he has been, as it seems to us, almost only of late, and not even then on all occasions, quite successful. However, these four pictures deserve unlimited consideration, as such. The cartoon (No. 1) of female study represents a beautiful woman, undraped to the waist with her arms thrown back over her head, and her hands in their voluptuous abandonment. The nude torso is rendered with lovely boldness and truth, and the whole conception is one of power. One of the portraits is of a lady of luxuriant beauty, the forms rounded with great softness, golden-haired, round-eyed, full-lipped; both subject and painting reminding one of a Rubens. The second portrait is of Mr. Tinin. A third portrait of "Mr. Hanbury" has again a Titianesque dignity and also subtle force, with that kind refinement of aspect for which we were wholly unprepared in a picture by Mr. Watts. The fourth portrait is of Mr. Gladstone, and is the most perfect of this artist's series of portraits of eminent men, it has with much precision truth to character and expression, just of the right degree of finish, a textural thinness and discordance of effect, which, according to the theory of modern writers on the science of light, is essential to virtue of oil-paint, and should go on blackening and losing harmony more and more. Setting theories aside, however, Mr. Hanbury's portrait raises, we think, questions of great interest and importance to artists. This portrait appears to have been painted many years; the other pictures have been recently executed. Now, the earlier Hanbury portrait, as certainly executed on too thin a foundation), will the final "vanishing," whether—if it possess the qualities—which is seen in the high-lights of the "Study" and the "Portrait of a Lady," are such into and unite with the more solid painting and present the perfectly united equality seen in the portrait of Mr. Hanbury? If it will do this, then we should have in the great Venetian "secrets" is finally and conclusively discovered.

Mr. Goodall, A.R.A., besides a drawing in chalk of a French girl, named "Rigolette" (we know not why), feeding her pet bird, contributes a picture of "The Attempted Escape of Mary Stuart from Lochleven Castle," which may serve as a good illustration that in the opinion of many was of late hardly fully sustained, the vessels new and remarkable for the power of the modern tone and effective interior lighting. Admirably rendered also is the story, told in a letter of Sir Walter Scott, that the head of the unfortunate Queen attempted to escape by assuming the part of her handmaid and carrying out the linen basket which had been placed on her face, and so passing out and entering the boat to pass the lock." The beautiful face of Mary, and the dejected and humble attitude of linen borne on her head, is a memorable success.

The picture by Mr. Ward, R.A., of "Dr. Johnson's First Interview with John Wilkes" realises an amusing incident in Boswell's biography so well that our readers will be glad to hear that we purpose engraving it. We shall also engrave the picture, by Mr. Frederick Goodall, of the composition here described as "Ivy Bower in the Days of Charles I.," of which there is a small duplicate in the Suffolk-street exhibition, there called "Reading the Banns." Mr. Goodall has, indeed, a favourite subject, representing a "Well, near Cairo." We shall likewise engrave the excellent little picture by Mr. Calderon, R.A., over the fireplace, named "The Guardian," together with Mr. Wyfield's clever piece of high comedy, "A Little Fatherly Advice," and, if we obtain permission, Mr. Yeames's droll representation of a midsummer long duel with her lapdog, entitled "Amoretta." Scenes of the most between a fortress and the surrounding town, and followed by an awkward footman bearing her train. Coming from a painter who has secured a reputation as that of Mr. Yeames, and from the necessity of throwing off what, in the slang of the studios, are denominated "pot-boilers," we cannot express too strongly our delight with "The Fancy Fair," or "His Likeness," pleasing and attractive as they undoubtedly are. Mr. Dobson, R.A., has sent the title "Taking an Opportunity," an effective dashing sketch of a lady in act to write a letter to "dear Jack," and a very clever two sheet, in the back parlour of a grocer's shop or store. In "Lads with Aviaries" by Mr. Leighton, A.R.A., the powerful painter of a gorgeously-brocaded robe certainly detracts from the interest which a coldly-coloured and ruled study would otherwise afford to love. By Mr. Millais, R.A., there are small sketches of a child turning with a bright laughing eye, from a piano, called "Attention Directed;" and of a child, entitled "Little Miss Muffet," and "a sensible view, we think, of the same little girl who sat for "My First Sermon." Mr. R. S. Marks's "character portraits" of some of our rustic feudal tenants presenting themselves as "Petitioners to the Young Heir" on the day he walks before the old family agent, are more full of real character than is usually found in the works of this humorous painter. Mr. Smyth, notwithstanding his apparently great facility of execution, must be placed among the group of eccentric painters who seem more or less to be emulating mediævalism. His picture of "Ophelia" exhibits with an unpleasant development of the inferior maxillary. And to increasingly hot colouring he begins to sacrifice modelling. Mr. R. Stanhope, a thoroughly-going modern realist, appears to follow the manner of Holman Hunt's "Light of the World," a realisation of the allegorical expression of the prophet, "I will bring forth my servant the shoot"—i.e., our Saviour (as we are to understand), habited in quasi high-priest vestments, with the mystical jewelled Urim and Thummim, literally treading with naked foot in the wine-press, after the old Eastern manner. We cannot but think this picture exhibits rather more a mistake in conception and execution, and that it is hardly calculated to attract public sympathy. Mr. Lucas, R.A., has a very characteristic Italian peasant when he kneels before a hideous but miracle-working old Franciscan friar of the Madonna. Mr. Lucas is, we think, standing its obvious mannerisms, is the picture called "The Mill." A maiden reading in a grove, with a view of a distant Italian peasant when he kneels before a hideous but miracle-working old Franciscan friar of the Madonna. Mr. Lucas is, we think, standing its obvious mannerisms, is the picture called "The Mill." A maiden reading in a grove, with a view of a distant after sundown, quaint old buildings shutting out the horizon, and which is pervaded by a beautiful sentiment of quiet evening. There is a fine feeling for beauty in Mr. Lucas's "Ophelia," though the execution should be that of a very young artist. Stretching along one side of the picture is a row of decorative paintings, designed for a dining-room screen of eight panels, representing the progression for a hundred years of human century, each panel (in one instance, however, two panels) having been executed by one of a number of gentlemen familiarly known as the "St. John's-wood Clique"—to wit, Messrs. Yeames, Hodgson, Leslie, Storey, Wynfield, and Marks. The subjects of these panels are admirably suited to their purpose, and may be inferred from their titles—"The Musician," "The Belle," "Forbidden Fruit," "The Gardener's Daughter," "Fish and Fowl," "Flowers and Confectionery," "The Bear's Head," and "The Magic Drum"—by-the-way reconstructing with the fool for having already taken the guest's place of honour. Many similar applications of decorative art to upholstery might be made with great advantage. We might have mentioned before that there is an elaborate picture here by Mr. W. B. Scott, which, despite technical shortcomings, reveals the bold, original, and fertile invention which has gained so wide a reputation for the wall-paintings executed by the artist in the north, one of which we recently engraved. The subject is "The Eve of the Deluge." Noah and his family are entering the ark, greeted on all sides by derision and mockery from wine-drinkers, love-makers, and other classes of antediluvians. It is the hot and ruddy close of a cloudless day; the sky is of a deep blue, and the sun is so sign of the coming flood, save one ominous cloud rising unnoticed save by one little child. We have only space to mention that there are also numerous figure-pictures by Messrs. Dobson, R.A.; Pickersgill, jun., R.A.; J. E. Wood, Hemsley, Hook, R.A., Ansdell, Cooper, A.R.A., Frith, R.A. ("Preparing a Cadger"), Legrez; Sant, A.R.A.; Folingsby (illustration of a well-known incident in the life of Sir Walter Scott); T. Lucas, E. Wallis, A. Hughes, J. Waylin, G. D. Leslie, B. J. Redford, E. J. Poynter, J. E. Hodgson, and Miss Kate Swift. Landscapes by Mr. Creswick, Linnell, sen., Mr. Stocks, R.A., has three pictures, rather dry and unusually negative in colour, but truly charming in sentiment. Mr. Danby's picture of "Sunset at Sea" is a very exact geological as well as topographical accuracy. Mr. Hook, R.A., has a picture of a small fishing-boat, with a couple of figures, driving along the western shore and a tree by way of the diminutive "Gleaner" (the property from Algiers of the late native England, gives a vigorous study entitled "Sunflowers—Sussex."

WINTER EXHIBITION AT THE ROOMS OF THE SOCIETY OF BRITISH ARTISTS, SUFFOLK-STREET.

The extensive collections forming this exhibition were brought together by, or are "under the superintendence of, Mr. Henry Graves, the publisher, and the Messrs. Gambart and Wallis at the French Gallery. This gathering is every respect surpasses its predecessor, and comprises many of the best works by our water-colour artists, &c., by female artists; and water-colour drawings; such of the Academicians as have not contributed to the Academy, and contributions sent by artists on their own account, and "Works," in the words of the advertisement, "specially painted for exhibition for this exhibition," together with some previously-exhibited pictures and drawings. In the present collection it is only to be mentioned that Mr. Wallis has judiciously, as we think) not obtained the highest price for the best contributions.

The first picture of leading interest is a large work by Mr. Orchardson, whose prize picture of "The Challenge," we engraved from the Royal Academy exhibition. The present picture, of "Mid-rendors, in a more elaborate composition than has hitherto appeared in the works of this artist, is entitled "Mid-day Rest." The duel of Sir Shrew, where "Christopher Sly" (238) awakes in the bed of "the lord" (239), and is the laughing-stock of the servants. It is hard to enjoy the jest of persuading him that he was the real lord, and that all the events of the preceding nights—even to the "Induction to Sly" were a mere insane delusion. Sly is seen in the picture edging out of bed and with his feet feverish thirst from his late strange bout upon him, roaring, "For God's sake, a pot of small ale!" to which modest request the servants set to attend him only answer with the most supercilious impertinence and mockery. Will's please your worship drink a cup of sack? Will't please your honour taste of these conserves? What raiment will your honour wear to-day? The confused and comical look of Christopher, as he finds himself addressed as a nobleman, and the air of the servants as the feast of which he was not allowed to partake; the extreme perspective of the room, with the "lord" in the background and the "lord" acting as major domo, and the introduction in the background of one of the lazy lounging attendants of the entertainment are all happily conceived. On the whole, perhaps, there is sufficient evidence here of a special humorous faculty to warrant the subject being taken up by some one possessing the same qualities in which he gained his first successes. The handling is as brilliant as ever, but we think the artist has sometimes erred in the matter monsoned alternation of thick and thin painting slightly detracts from the value of the picture as a work of art, and especially as a picture to hang in a room. Mr. Petite, another artist who has suddenly come to the front, has a picture of "Shakespeare's Birthplace," very valuable in some respects, of an ungry monk demanding from a poor cotter's wife money for the use of the holy-water sprinkler. In the engraving this picture we shall have another opportunity of dilating on it; suffice it here to say that it is called "The Fee," and that the Monk—an Inquisitorial Visit" (304). Another but smaller picture by Mr. Petite, which, if we obtain permission, we may also engrave, is called "The Interview" (229), and represents a poor orchestral fiddler playing and keeping time, in highly-excited prestissimo, for a rich old lady and her daughter, who are displaying every frivolity in rehearsing some extravagant pas seul.

Mr. Cobbett, who contributes the best picture, in technical respects, we have seen by him in any exhibitions save those of the Royal Academy, has sent a picture of "Lovers" which we never making a mistake in this respect—is "Jeanie Deans' Visit to Effie in Prison" (274). The two figures selected for representation being when Jeanie, as described so pathetically by Scott, sees the "Heart of Mid-Lothian," watching the effect in the Duke's face of the perusal of the evidence of her sister's innocence. More sensibility in her anxious interest, perhaps, would have been shown by Effie during the same perusal; but the countenance of Argyle, lit by reflected light from the paper he holds, is admirably expressive of the fact that he is generally while study and vigorous as usual, has streaks of tone which relieve crop into those of the surrounding parts. We are not sure that Mr. Ward's picture is, but more remarkable is the very potent richness and depth of the colour, especially in the dress of the principal figure. Mr. Long is proving himself a not unworthy follower of Mr. Phillip. His two large pictures exhibited here are full of power and artistic advance. The most important of these pictures, "Mating-making Granada" (259), we shall engrave, and have, therefore, a better opportunity of describing it. The picture is full of the peculiar characteristic of Spain—the procession of "Corpus Christi in Cordova" (261). The effect is very fine, the principal figure—that of the Virgin—carrying the bleeding wounds, is being borne by priests on a lofty platform, and the sun, while fine as a purely technical regard it with and express various degrees of devotion, according to their rank and character, is not overpowering. The picture just soberly rich in colour, and well massed or contrasted in effect, as was those pictures, some time ago, which first attracted public notice in the works of Mr. Long's eminent master, is sacrificed to breadth and truth of colour. We cannot but think that Mr. Long's style is seen in Mr. Burgess's Spanish "Improvisators" (454). Here the drawing is precise, the handling more minute, and the management of imitative completeness in the sun at abstract artistic qualities; and we must add that all the figures in Mr. Burgess's picture are most strongly individualised like figures in a Spanish representation of improvisatore showing his glistening white teeth as he makes some point, and the rest of the group laughing heartily at the point, and the group of listeners, male and female, old and young, laughing at his performance. Mr. W. M. Egley (whose Academy picture of "Burns and Jone" reappears on these walls) contributes a picture entitled "A Dream of Long Ago" (406). A maiden in classic costume stands in a somewhat statuesque pose on a garden terrace, under the azure sky of Greece, and in full sunlight, which burns on and chequers the marble inlays, fluted columns, flowers and fountain surrounding her. Though hard, artificial in feeling and lighting, and certainly too positive and vivid to be any but a fever "dream," one must still recognise in this picture a skill in composition and a perception for beauty and grace which may prove equal to better things. We select from the other pictures by Mr. J. D. Watson the one of which we have retained the most favourable impression—viz., "The Signal" (252), as Italian youth in scarlet and crimson drapery standing with one hand clutching his poniard knocking at a door. Mr. W. B. Richmond (son of the Associate) has a singular picture of a tall woman of Oriental type, in a sickly blue robe, standing in a kind of lawn, clasping with frantic anxiety, a babe to her bosom and with an older child clinging to her in terror. It is entitled "At Bay" (340); and if intended, as we presume it is, to represent an episode of the Massacre of the Innocents, we would urge that there is not the slightest ethnological reason to suppose that a Jewish mother ever resembled the half-caste—half Arab, half Hebrew—here selected. With all its eccentricity, however, the work affords evidence of natural power. Mr. Knightly Mirror (221)—a title the more obvious meaning of which is to suggest the reflection of the face of a lady's head (evidently distorted, by-the-way, as it would appear) in the polished breastplate of her lover or husband—is a disappointing picture, as are those by Mr. Morris. There is an advance in richness and depth of colour; but the subject is, we think, repulsive, and the face of the knight seems to have addressed himself to rather lower tastes than he has hitherto chosen to gratify.

Mr. Frederick Goodall, R.A., is represented by an exquisite little picture, "The Return of the Dove to the Ark," and a fierce work "Feeding the Swans" (267), to which we have already alluded. Pleasing little pictures, in a manner, are also those by Mr. Frith, R.A. (277), by Mr. Frith, R.A. From two or three charming pictures by Mr. J. Sant, A.R.A., we select for engraving the "Walk from School" (406). Mr. Barnes has made a notable advance in his picture, under the title "Never Again" (411), of an old Knight or Baron, who has clearly regretted somewhat fully the pretext lost wife and mother. Mr. Haylar has adventured on the lifesize, with a picture entitled "Lucia of the Bride" (201) is scarcely, but rather empty and inane. We prefer the picture at a pair of young French fisher-folk indulging in the amusement of a female mesmerises a net, and bearing the silly-equivocal title, "The First Fowl." Mr. Boxall, R.A., has several amusing or sweet little genre-pictures by Mr. A. Burr, we shall engrave the "Caught Napping" (200). Mr. C. Baxter, A.R.A., has a pleasing picture entitled "A Varlet Waiting for an Answer" (217)—the word "varlet" being, of course, used in the old and contemptuous sense (now thought its an "varlets")—a capitally-relieved figure, but in advanced leg obviously out of drawing. By Mr. John Faed (brother of the Academicians) there is a pretty pathetic picture, also entitled "The Horrors of War" (422), representing a family plunged in mourning and desolation by the news of a letter that announces the death of some near soldier relative.

Mr. Lee has contributed two cabinet pictures by artists of repute that, in order to confine our article within inevitable limits, we must be content to refer to, as well as two good examples of the works of artists—viz., Messrs. Le Jeune, A.R.A., T. T. Dickson, G. E. Hicks, Rowse, Hayes, Mrs. Mutrie, Mrs. Duffield, J. B. Bedford, E. Pope, F. Sodon, C. Goblie, J. A. Fitzgerald, T. A. F. Graham, W. Douglas, W. D. Leslie, E. Hayes, Mrs. Bodichon, Miss Kerr, F. Wyburd, A. J. Woolmer, J. J. Hill, R. Dowling, A. H. Weigall, C. Davis, and C. J. Girardot. Of merely all the following we may speak with certainty in works that we have not yet noticed at length, but have introduced thereof, and which, therefore, we need not review anew:—Highland Mary" (No. 1), by Mr. J. C. Horsley, R.A.; "The Mother in the Nursery" (401), by J. C. Horsley, R.A.; "The Virgin Mary and Infant Saviour" (3), by Mr. Ward, R.A.; "Ivy Bower" (4), by Mr. Ward, R.A.; "The Democrats" (83), by J. Campbell; "Mary Scott, the Flower of Yarrow" (84), by Mr. W. Wylie; and portraits by H. P. Poole, R.A.; the late Sir Watson Gordon, P. H. Calderon, A.R.A., W. C. Thomas, R. Ansdell, A.R.A., T. Faed, F. Weekes, H. T. Barwell, and W. Bromley. There is a picture of great promise by Mr. Lance, "Waiting for the Post Academy exhibition, "Sunshine—Notwaiting Count of Artois" (405), which we shall hereafter notice.

The works by female artists (including a noble picture, "The Lady Superior," by Mrs. Bodichon), the water-colour drawings, and, blushing for the discourtesy, the works by female artists (among which is Mdlle. Rosa Bonheur's great picture of cattle ploughing), we must reserve for a future notice.

Mr. Robert Jackson, the sculptor, was permitted to take a photographic sketch of the bust of the late Lord Lyndhurst, in executing a bust of his Lordship with the assistance of the cast and from personal knowledge.

THE MAGAZINES.

THE principal strength of this month's Cornhill consists in the fiction which yields pleasure in the unanimously pleasant style of the old series literature of the day. "Wives and Daughters" is better than ever, and the new story is equally agreeable. "Wives" we had indeed hoped that Mrs. Gaskell would have contrived to extricate her narrative from the melancholy tone of Miss Browning's death; the quartet of young people, in whose fortunes we have been led to take so much interest, would all, after the purgatorial fire of grief, have been restored to bliss, have been left comfortably settled according to their respective inclinations. The writhers, however, has had recourse to the dreaded unreal receipt for cutting through the difficulties which impeded her path to a satisfactory finale. Molly Gibson's marriage is no more, a pleasant comedy is clustered with deep pathos, and Molly Gibson is apparently to be left a widow, with two children on the premises. Remarkable, is so far better this month that there is less Mashiverlian and more human feeling. Lady Ludlow's subplot—the affairs of Miss Galloway's personages are, after all, but puppets in his hands, is this time less doubtful—is also good. The other great objection to his work, its stifling moral atmosphere, remains unchanged. In his meticulous papers constitute us, as usual, to admire the inexhaustible fertility of his invention, to object to admitting of lively chatty treatment. None are of special mark, the most interesting being a picturesque description of the Isle of Wight, and Mr. Lowell's very successful in reproducing the panoramic character of life and manners in a series of "Provincial Medical Sketches." Mr. Lowell is a valuable essay, expesing, in no unkindly spirit, the abuses that have crept into these institutions.

The Shilling Magazine boasts one of the best of current novels—Mr. Kingsley's "Hereward the Wake." Wives and Daughters," "The Wild Flower of Ravenswarth." Neither prosue on the one hand, nor melodramatic on the other, this charming tale combines romantic interest with truth to life and an accurate estimate of human character. "Phemie Keller," from which much was expected, is comparatively tame and, perhaps, somewhat too reminiscent of a sensational contemporaine character. "The Ghetto at Rome" is, however, a notable exception. Being a sketch of an important Roman locality delineated by one possessed of the best opportunities for becoming acquainted with it. "House at Home" contains a vigorous exposure of the abuses alleged to exist in the infirmary of St. Leonard's, Shoreditch. The other contributions are of little interest. William Black is highly distinguished by fancy and spirit. The mermaid's song had been sung before, but it has been sung with a spirit as pleasing as it is unique. Sleep" might be imagined to be another physiological essay, but is in fact a poem in blank verse on an incident said to have occurred to Bacchus, but which the mythologists have somehow omitted to communicate.

Fenor begins a new story in "The Beauclercs." It is so far a lively, pleasant tale, in the "Digby Grand" style, and bids fair to prove an attraction. "Gilbert Rugge" has reached its sixteenth chapter, and can hardly be continued much longer. It would have been terrible to compress, into a single paragraph or story in the same. The most important paper in the number is the searching analysis of the work in which M. Cohausen has attempted to open up the ancient interpretations of Sir H. Rawlinson and his confrères. The controversy is of great importance for the French scholar owes credit for the acquisitions with which ancient history as supposed to have been lately enriched from Assyrian and Babylonian sources, and views the alleged discoveries. The reviewer, however, succeeds in making it perfectly clear that M. Cohausen's own interpretations are contrary to the last degree, and that Sir H. Rawlinson's translation of the Behistun inscriptions are impregnable to any criticism. It may observe, however, that he is very cautious about advancing similar claims for the Assyrian versions, and evidently considers that in this department the Layards and Talbots have been going somewhat too fast. Another reviewer throws some doubt on the value of Mr. Lecky's historical essay on Rationalism, the reception of which has been so enthusiastic. He thinks, apparently, that the modifications of belief are sometimes too rapid for the facts of evidence, and less by general repugnance, for the prevalence of which at particular epochs it is difficult to account. The writer has a clearer and harder head than the author he criticises, but less of the imaginative temperament. The remaining contributions are the ordinary fare of opinion. "Town Life in the South of France" is an interesting sketch; and when it is stated that the paper on Lord Palmerston entirely consists of personal reminiscences, it is needless to add that it is very pleasant and attractive. "The Wisher Shop," by the author of "Paul Ferroll," belongs to a class of which we have had almost the moral allegory. It is an excellent specimen of the kind, and something more, being, like everything that Miss Clive produces, animated by a marked originality of treatment.

The Month continues to improve, and nothing but its character as the organ of a sect prevents its obtaining a wide circulation. The best of the merely interesting papers is a critique on the poems of Henry Taylor, by Mr. Aubrey de Vere, of which it is enough to say that it is worthy of the writer and the subject. The most valuable paper is a General Lamoricière is noticeable for the strange perversion of sentiment which passes over the honourable incidents of his early career, to dwell approvingly on his subsequent treachery. The same is an oppressed people by the aid of foreign mercenaries. "Recollections of an Old Musician" is a valuable contribution to the intellectual history of the last generation. The writer is clearly a representative of the musical amateur, possessed of taste and enthusiasm, but who have afforded the Church of Rome so many recruits; and nothing can be better than the naïveté of the confession of the Catholic enthusiasm than dreary, which is the epithet that best suits this month's Victoria.

The Dublin University continues to afford an asylum to creations of the former days in harmony with which the new are in congruous than with that of the present. We are glad that it does. Will and Sidney are the "Stories in a Transition Age," they evince real genius; and there is poetry as well as power in "Ellen Middleton." another excellently opened with a learned but glowing description of Glastonbury Abbey, concludes with a tirade on the Reformation as outrageous in its adulation as almost to seem designed for a burlesque.

Temple Bar depends chiefly on its novels. Miss Braddon is clever, but unpleasant. Mr. Yates writes with more than average vigour; the present instalment of Mr. Wills's original fiction is one of the best. The number contains a very pleasant account of Theodore Martin's translations from the Latin poets, written, we imagine, for the sake of introducing a version of the first eclogue of Virgil's "Cœa," one of the most masterly renderings ever made from one language into another. It is not so new to us as C. probably supposes it was to author. The same is true of the ballad, by this time, to have done much more. The St. James's Magazine continues nothing remarkable; and we are falling daily further from notice in the uniform liveliness and talent of London Society. Good Words, Macmillan's Magazine, and Fraser's Magazine are the same as usual in attaining the ends they respectively propose. The Cornhill's Monthly also contains a novel by a notable, supported by some curious illustrations of the inaccuracy of eminent authors in quoting Scripture. None of the literary articles, however, are so ridiculous about than one in the magazine itself, where Princess Charlotte is termed "Queen Consort."

Our Mutual Friend. By Charles Dickens. Nos. 19 and 20. (Chapman and Hall.) If the progress of this story is disappointing, it is not feeble and languid, the conclusion at least is all that could be desired. We will not spoil the interest of those who are reading it by with the surprise in store for him, but merely observe that it will be found to compensate in some degree for that unpleasant exhibition of the main feature of the plot, which, notwithstanding Mr. Dickens's ingenious pleading in his preface, we must persist in considering a great blemish in the work. In other respects the plot is more carefully constructed than in any of this former writings; we have often displayed himself to more advantage in the conception of the grotesque and in semi-poetical description. If everything meant for fun and much of what has been said before would have been omitted, we should be had attained from the remotest approach to a delineation of fashionable society. The novel would have been the shorter for this, but it would, however, has not yet learned to accommodate himself to the modifications which the experience of life is sure to bring to the moralising that necessarily effect even in a genius like his. He will persist in trying to write as he wrote thirty years ago, and to make his readers laugh at pointless satire and pumped-up tears. Then comes something truly admirable, because natural to his genius, and the reader feels that a general effect is that of a most heterogeneous assemblage of beauties and deformities. If, however, we may venture attention to the passages where Mr. Dickens is truly himself, we must acknowledge that he has rather gained than lost, and that, tried by these portions only, Our Mutual Friend surpasses anything he has written since Bleak House.

A party of scientific men is to be dispatched by the French Government to explore the River Amazon and its tributaries.

The Queen has appointed James Playster Harriss, William Pere William-Freeman, and John Gordon Kennedy, Esqrs., gentlemen-at-law to be second secretaries in her Majesty's diplomatic service. George Buckley Mathew, Esq., C.B., her Majesty's Consul-General in the Republic of Central America, has been appointed her Majesty's Minister Plenipotentiary to the United States of Colombia. Sir Henry Bulwer, K.C.B., has been sent to Ronald Ryrsod as Consul at Stuka for the Emperor of Mexico.

The following amended regulations have been issued in lieu of those given in a notice, dated the 30th of June last, relative to the postage charges on the letters addressed to or sent by officers and soldiers on service in her Majesty's ships in the Pacific:—Letters addressed to ships stationed at ports in Chili, Peru, or other places in the Pacific, and letters sent by officers and soldiers serving in those ships, will be charged with the ordinary rate of postage between the United Kingdom and foreign parts, viz.—Officers' letters, 1d. the single rate not exceeding half an ounce, and 1d. for every additional half ounce. Letters addressed to ships stationed at Valparaiso and other Chilian and Peruvian places in the North Pacific are liable to the following rates, British and foreign combined, viz.—Officers' letters, 1s. 4d. the single rate not exceeding half an ounce's letters, 6d. each letter, viz. New York. Officers' letters, 1s. the single rate not exceeding 4 oz., letters, 6d. each letter, viz. Panama.

The excellent portrait of Lord Palmerston which has been engraved for the Number of our Journal is one by Messrs. John and Charles Watkins, photographic artists, of Parliament-street, Westminster; it was taken three or four years ago. We have received several other photographs, which deserve great commendation, but which represent the late Minister as he appeared within the last twelvemonth, showing a less vigorous state of body and mind. One of the most agreeable and most faithful we have seen is a full-length portrait, by Messrs. Mayall, representing the noble Lord standing in the park, with his hat in his right hand, and with his left hand resting on a small table beside him, as though he were about to rise and take his leave after a morning call. The well-known photographic artists, Messrs. Maull and H. Downey (to whom we were indebted for the excellent portrait of Mr. Cobden), have produced several cartes de visite of Lord Palmerston; one of which, giving the whole figure, is a most admirable likeness; it is admirable for the unconscious earnestness of the expression of the face.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

THE report in London that the Pitchcroft meadows were under water, and that pedigrees were the only "good things" likely to be "landed" there during the week, proved to be a mere jest; and those who had not had a thorough Newmarket surfeit have enjoyed three very fair days of fun and cross-country sport. The Worcester Races, as they looked after" by the handicappers since Huntingdon, was fifth in the Autumn Handicap; and Somerset, who ran very big and was not backed, did not pass the post. The host of sportsmen have no wish for these "winter meetings;" and they are liked best by those "sublime patriots" who find the hedges the worst of a wet October (or earlier) enjoy their pleasantest recollections when they retire, in the evening of life, to their Bath chairs, and there "live" their own cabbages, mark the brimming "milk-pail," and make their cattle "come to grief."

A very well attended, dreadfully wet, and anything but a lively Hoylake Meeting, resulting more to the advantage of Liverpool "the great mystery horse" of the winter and the spring, closet it by receiving a handicap mark. Mr. Chaloner's Lecturer may have brought back so far £6000 in stakes out of their £11,000 purchase money. Hires but twelves, although a favourite with a portion of gentleman in his hands at Newmarket, and three yearlings are left in the Fenton Colwick Course. The setting for the Cambridgeshire went off very fairly, but Darby Griffith's mount was completely whitewashed from his three most important engagements, ostensibly on account of "a cough," but more probably because his owner did not care to meet the cracks, has rather damped his supporters. The Cambridgeshire, like the Derby, is a race which should be by Stockwell, as well as the dark Bribery colt, who is spoken of favourably for the Two Thousand and Derby, is by the son of his brother St. Albans. Speculators are also nibbling at the Marquis of Hastings's new purchase, Blue Blood, and will take 40 to 1 about him; but it seems somewhat apocryphal why this son of Fazzoletto and Circassian should be termed "the most highly-bred colt in England."

Mr. Merry, the Hon. Mr. Blackwood at Newmarket has produced a pretext from the Committee for the Derby, in particular out of sqpes and stakes, and the carelessness with which they are kept. Merry may be right, but the public will not be withdrawn from H. Grimshaw but his pony luckily saw them and jumped them. Early given up for lost, he reappeared in time to ride Hedgeford. He was to have been married some time since, and "the happy day was to be on Thursday," necessary special licence, but the dispensation presented himself, and the ceremony had to be adjourned. It then turned out that Merry would be "married" in the park on his pony, which prevented him from travelling, and wrote a letter to the Committee to ask for a dispensation to give Custance to-day. This the latter forgot to do, and on finding Merry at Liverpool it is the writer there days afterwards. However, "all's well that ends well," but the Merry will be bridegroom before the Derby is run.

The list of landing racing fixtures for next year has appeared. It includes the Newmarket Spring Meeting, commencing on the 30th of the Two Thousand on April 17, the Derby on May 16, and the Ascot Cup on June 20. The Goodwood Cup is fixed for July, but with the Newmarket July things fall into their old train. The Chester Cup on May 23, and the Manchester Whitsuntide Handicap Spring Meeting.

Mr. Jackson's Villiers has lost twin foals by Blair Athol—rather an unfortunate beginning for Mr. Jackson. King Tom's subscription has been raised to 1000 sovs., and has filled, we hear, at that price. There is no truth in the report that Lord Stamford's Lady Elizabeth has stud from sale, and as little, we should think, in the rumour that Mr. Merry has sold Lady Evelyn to go to the States. Osmaston de Verry goes north to Croft, and Crater's subscription is full. About forty-five, including the cup, are left in the race.

Sir Hope Grant has been gazetted Quartermaster-General, in the place of Sir Alex. Dallas.

Sir Frederick Williams of Kars, Lieutenant Governor of Nova Scotia, left, last Saturday, from Liverpool for Halifax.

The Earl of Derby was entertained, on Saturday last, at the commencement of the new boulevards in Florence, undertaken by an English company, and which will, when finished, be a great ornament.

The Emperor Napoleon has ordered a scientific mission to explore the Caucasus from the source of the Black-sea to Tibilisi, where all traces of the river disappear. The mission is to traverse an inhospitable country, inhabited by savages, to modern geographers, although certain ruins scattered over it attest the fact that a high degree of civilisation once existed in this deserted region.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our Correspondent in the City.)

In nearly all departments of the Stock Exchange considerable inactivity has prevailed during the week, and the tone of the Money Market has been somewhat unsettled. The Bank of England rate of discount continues here had a decaying tendency. The Government loaders, however, have been in request, and prices have ruled firm, owing to the amount of cash in hand. In the Foreign Market business has been very limited, and prices have fluctuated but little.

The Railway Share Market has been active for accommodation, and the rates have ruled high. Caledonian, Great Northern, and London and Brighton A. have been in demand. The following are the quotations are as follow:—

	per cent.		per cent.		per cent.
Bank Stock	2	Exchequer Bills	2	Four months' bills	3 per cent.
Three months' bills	2	Consols for account	90½	Six months' bills	3 per cent.

Bullion in the Bank of England has been paid for short loans.

The Bank of France has reduced the rate of discount to 4 per cent. On other parts of the Continent money is very firm in price. The rates are:—

	per cent.		per cent.		per cent.
Paris	4	Frankfort	5	Turin	6
Hamburg	4	Amsterdam	4	Trieste	6
Berlin	5	Madrid	9	Leghorn	10
Vienna	5	Genoa	6	Naples	6
Augsburg	5	Venice	6	Palermo	6

Rather large quantities of gold still continue to be sent across America. From other countries the supplies of the precious metals are moderate. The following amounts have been received at the Bank of England, since it re-opened, for export as in 1844, per annum. The last shipments of gold to Alexandria, Egypt, and Malta, were made by the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company.

On Monday Peace and Indian Securities were dull. At the close of business prices were:—Consols, 90 to 91; Reduced, 90 to 91; New 3 per Cents, 90 to 91; India Stock, 220 to 222; Ditto, 4 per Cents, 97 to 98; Bank Stock, 344 to 346; India Stock, 220 to 222; Ditto, Five per Cents, 103; Ditto, Five per Cents, 1861, 103; Ditto, Five per Cents, 1862, 103; Ditto, Five per Cents, 1863, 103; Ditto, Five per Cents, 1864, 103; Ditto, Five per Cents, 1865, 103; Ditto, Five per Cents, 1866, 103; Ditto, Five per Cents,

FUNERAL OF LORD PALMERSTON: THE HEARSE LEAVING BROCKET HALL, HATFIELD, HERTS.

ARRIVAL OF THE HEARSE AT CAMBRIDGE HOUSE, PICCADILLY.—SEE PAGE 447.

LORD PALMERSTON.

THE public life of Lord Palmerston could scarcely be told in a dozen volumes. The same number of lines would almost suffice for his private history. In the following paragraphs we shall endeavour to supply a record which will indicate rather than describe the principal incidents in the political career of the late statesman, interpolating, when it may seem convenient, some notes of personal character. It is manifest that at the present time no complete and satisfactory biography of the late Premier can be furnished. The "Peerage" may give the dates of his changes of office, the debates may be hastily ransacked for fragments of his speeches, conclusions may be offered by those who have acted with him in Parliament or known him in society, anecdotes of a more or less authentic nature may be collected from gossip, and letters may be remembered and sought out in autograph books. But the result, as yet, must be incomplete and unartificial, and it may be years before some duly qualified writer aided by official documents and by friends of the departed, will be able to present to England a worthy biography of her great Minister.

The most popular of our statesmen sprang from no gallant birth. The heralds give him a Saxon pedigree, reaching up to Algar, Earl of Mercia, and also including the "grim Earl," husband of Lady Godiva. Later, a distinguished figure appears in the list of his ancestors. Sir William Temple, Swift's patron, a man of accomplishments and tact, but too selfish to take his fair share in the work of his day—a characteristic which he assuredly did not transmit to his distinguished descendant—was father of Sir John Temple, Speaker of the Irish House of Commons. His elder son, Henry, was created an Irish Peer, Baron Temple and Viscount Palmerston, in 1722, and thus the last Viscount's great grandfather. He married Miss Anne Houlton, and, secondly, Isabella, Lady Fryer; and by the first of these unions he had a son, Henry, who by his marriage with Mary, the daughter of a Lord Mayor of London, had an only son, also named Henry; and the former Henry dying in Lord Palmerston's lifetime, the latter, born 1739, succeeded as second Lord Palmerston in 1757. This nobleman, the late Minister's father, first married a lady of Cheshire, but she died in two years, without children. In January, 1783, he married Mary, daughter of Benjamin Mee, Esq., "said to have been a Dublin tradesman."

The second Lord Palmerston was a scholar and a man of ability. He was a patron of art—which in those days was unfashionable—and he was a great favourite in society. Dr. Johnson, writing to Boswell in the year of his Lordship's marriage, says :—"On Tuesday I dined with The Club, where Lord Palmerston proposed a question against my opinion, was rejected;" but Boswell adds in a note that the Viscount was soon afterwards elected into that brilliant circle. Horace Walpole has many allusions to him. Under the year 1768 he says :—"Had there been any news, I should have heard—say, perhaps I did—for I called at Mr. Beauclerk's in the evening, where I found Lord Pembroke, Lord Palmerston, Garrick, Burke, Sir Joshua, Lord Robert Spencer, and Mr. Gibbon (what a party to drop in upon); but they talked so loud—not the two last—and made such a noise, and Lord Palmerston so angry that I was trying to talk (what does this mean?), that it was impossible to know what they said under the distance of a mile from them." Horace Walpole also records what is probably would have been the greatest wonder of all, that Tickell, grandson of Addison's friend, had written a satire on sentimental poets, in which he says that Lord Palmerston forever "talks an admirable work," and "Lord Hervey spoil it veneer) rebuses and charades with chips of poetry, and, when Lord of the Admiralty, wrecked ships, like Arion, with a song." Sure, that is an excellent adaptation. It reads finely enough to us; but the age was one in which a classic allusion was very dear. Lord Palmerston, as we also gather from the same delightful chronicler, was present, with a world of distinguished folk, at Mrs. Hobart's private theatricals, at Ham-common, in November, 1782. "There was a great deal of good company collected from the environs, and even from London, but so armed with fear of disturbances that, when the servants were drawn up after the play, you would have thought it had been a midnight review of conspirators on the heath." As a curiosity, not likely to have been seen by readers of the present generation, we will cite a few lines from the conclusion of Lord Palmerston's prose on Boswell, the father that they are very pretty :—

In vain the stealing hand of Time
May pluck the blossoms of their prime.
Envy may talk at Genius proud,
Have bites drop, and roses fade,
Yet Boswell's name, and Boswell's fame,
Superadded of the wreaths of years,
Affection, that recalls the past,
And hails the pleasing influence fast,
Shall still preserve the lover's flame,
In every sense of life the same;
And still with fond endearments bind
The wife, the mistress, and the friend.

The second Lord Palmerston could write better things than this; and did; but we have introduced him sufficiently to show that the formation of the character of our own statesman was in the hands of a father who was a gentleman, a man of the world, and a man of education. Adding that he was in Parliament for many years, and died at Brocket, (then) 20, Hanover-square, on the 17th of April, 1802, we pass on to the history of him whom the nation mourns.

Henry John Temple, third Viscount Palmerston, was born at Broadlands, the family seat, near Romsey, in Hampshire, on the 20th of October, 1784. It has become a custom of modern biographers, parodying some of the best effects of Macaulay, to accompany the statement of the date of a child's birth with a prognostic of the career in life for which the child might have seen on its first birthday had it been able to give a general survey of mankind. Instructive as such a process is to be considered, we may venture to believe, not obviously to the writer of the biography, we will on the present occasion abstain from attempting to depict what the infant Palmerston might have done had he been also full-grown and observant in all things. Politics and the affairs of the world could have had small interest for him, allowing him all sorts of precocities, which have never been attributed to him until some sixteen years later. In 1796 he was at Harrow School, head boy in the second remove of the fourth form; and among the other boys were the future Lord Chancellor Cottenham; the late Lord Spencer, better known as "honest Lord Althorp;" the future Premier, Lord Aberdeen; and the Earl of Lonsdale, whose tastes at a later date were a good deal like Lord Palmerston's own. He was fag to the late Rev. Henry Law, Rector of Standon, from Harrow he went to Edinburgh, and studied at the University under Dugald Stewart. He was there for three years, and has testified to the great advantages which he derived from his Scotch education; but it is clear that the highborn student did not make any of those desperate struggles for distinction which were so amply rewarded in the cases of several of his class-fellows. He became Viscount while at Edinburgh, and was next entered at St. John's College, Cambridge, where he is said to have worked with more than the average diligence of a young nobleman.

But now, if not earlier, Lord Palmerston must have looked round at the world. In 1806 the young Tory was invited to become a candidate for the University. The vacancy was caused by the death of William Pitt, who had sat for Cambridge from the year in which Palmerston was born until the 23rd of January in the year above mentioned. With Pitt fell his Cabinet. Lord Hawkesbury declined to take Mr. Pitt's place, but did not decline his lucrative office of Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports. Lord Grenville was sent for, and told the King that, in order to make his ministry "a broad bottom for Mr. Fox, 'I know that,' said King George; "have all your arrangements ready by Wednesday." And so the Ministry called "All the Talents" came into office. It was a sort of coalition, and Mr. Canning's biographer says:—"Lord Moira has not liked coalitions. Sidmouth and Ellenborough," a faithful old servant of the King, "refuse to work for new servants; but were in the Cabinet, in which Grenville was chief; Fox, Foreign Secretary; Erskine, Lord Chancellor; Lord Holland, Minister of the Duchy of Lancaster. He was also member for the University of Cambridge, for Lord Palmerston had declined the battle with him, and was defeated, receiving, however, 129 votes against Lord Henry's 146. Lord Henry Petty, the future Marquis of Lansdowne, stood above upon the poll may have signified that he was considered a young man of much promise. In the meantime, he was, at first, a Tory, for Bletchingley.

There was doubt whether the King would be able to endure Mr. Fox; but, as Mr. Charles Knight observes, the Sovereign was not obstinate, but once came to his senses. The King told Fox that he had little thought that they should meet again as friends, but that he had a desire to look back on past grievances, and should never remind Fox of them. Mr. Fox replied that he should be the last man who would commend him to his King. But Fox was dying. He fell in harness, on September 13th, 1806, in his 58th year. He was enfeebled, but with his colleagues, and best upon an honourable peace and the abolition of the slave trade. In reference to Nelson and Fox, Moore wrote :—

Quenched are our beacon lights :
Those of the hundred fights;
Fit pair of friends to grace
Trafalgar's mighty victory.
Truth, peace, and freedom long.

"The giant race is fled," indeed. Pitt and we are left in the hands of little ones; whom we know to be diminutive, having measured them against their elders. However, England has held her own, and though men feel at this hour as men felt in 1806, they are not as sad as ever when the hour strikes.

Napoleon, at this crisis displaying all his usual energy and more than his usual treachery, marched against Prussia, conquered at Jena, and entered Berlin in October. Then the Berlin Decree was enfolded, but a dissolution was resolved upon, and the Cabinet had a majority when the House met in November. Lord Palmerston was absent one of the members for Newport, in the Isle of Wight. The noble bill for the abolition of the slave trade was carried by a large majority; and the House shouted again and again when Romilly announced Wilberforce, the early friend of mankind, with Napoleon, waiting in blood to usurped thrones. Lord Palmerston heard shouts, and it is not astonishing in a man's history. It is due to him to remember that the House then sought him in the Lobby, and that when Mr. Canning was been the unrelenting foe of slavery, and that he had learned to appeal to the English public, in the manner which he was enfeebled, for given in which the fortunes of Administrations obeyed the real will of the nation since how faithfully our Parliament represents us all. Again Earl Derby came in, and held office for upwards of a year; and then, defeated on the Reform Bill which it had been forced to introduce, dissolved, and again fell. Another Palmerston Administration was formed, and it endured until the 18th of October, 1865, when the veteran, who had so long and so nobly served his country, succumbed to illness and age, and expired within two days of completing his eighty-first year.

It is too soon to attempt a summary of his character, even were it one which could be admitted of such treatment. At present we are all too full of kindly recollections of his services, his geniality, and his English spirit to tolerate judicial criticism on his history. We are mourning a man who was a friend to us all. When the time comes for a calm review of his career it may not be impossible, whether his place which he should hold in the estimation of posterity. Yet we think that, even in these circumstances, the task of writing the long and harmonised idea of the departed statesman will be difficult. He was a thorough Englishman, earnest in his love of his country, but more so than himself, like a rule man, to the changing circumstances of the times; and a character like this has seldom been found to endure for it, than more symmetric. But, be this as it may, the time has not come; and it is much more gratifying to close our observation with a heartfelt tribute to the memory of one of the best statesmen and best-loved men who have ever enjoyed over the destinies of England. To quote a verse from a poem which his death has called forth:—

Our brave Regis h Chief!—lay him down for the sleeping
Then sprinkle may dimmed eyes with the tears of the brave
Honour claims the proud vigil!—her Love will come weeping,
And hang many garlands on Palmerston's bier!

FUNERAL OF LORD PALMERSTON

THE propriety and good taste with which all the arrangements for Lord Palmerston's funeral were conducted have been the theme of universal eulogy to record that in the general unanimity of feeling on the occasion of his death. Men of all ranks and classes and parties have expressed a sincere though sobered regret for the loss of one whose cheerful presence and frank manner had won for him a personal affection; whose more substantial virtues of fidelity, justice, and generosity have now attested by proof; and who had rendered public services to the State, as well as his consummate ability and experience in its business, must be admitted by all who have studied the signs of the times, whether or not they have been disposed to rely on him as a political guide.

It is creditable, indeed, to the present temper of the nation that Conservatives, Liberals, and Reformers of every shade of opinion should have agreed, with an unanimity unprecedented, to honour alike the memory of the late Prime Minister, more especially for his exhibition of those moral and personal qualities which are confessedly more useful to the community, as well as to their possessor, than the most splendid talents of the ambitious and unscrupulous. Lord Palmerston was endowed with more than average intelligence and sagacity, besides having had experience of public affairs, parliamentary and official training, cannot be denied; but it is probable that neither his mental powers nor his remarkable energy of will would have gained him the highest place in our Government (unconnected as he was by birth with any of the great aristocratic families) if he had not been liked and esteemed for some of those graces of character and manner which engage our goodwill and confidence likewise in private life, and which do to the duty of the statesman what oil does to the wheels of his own spirit and demeanour.

This, at least, was the reflection which seemed to be most naturally suggested by the scene of last Friday in Westminster Abbey, where the minds of spectators, chastened and solemnised by the awe of the rites of religion, and by the near contemplation of death, would be disposed to think very little in sign of ostentation or parade or skill, and of any worldly success which it might have earned. But the interest of the spectacle which was then and there presented is said to have been in his long life, might well be a subject of admiration to those who stood by as he was laid in the body buried in peace;" and if, as we presume, be owed a large share of the sympathy which was given to the exercise of some moral virtues—such as honourable dealing, candour, forgiveness of injuries, and benevolence—we may also find a consolation and mental enjoyment, as well as the natural tenderness which is felt for old age, and the saddening effect of the extinction of a name which for the name of Palmerston a household word, may have prevailed among all classes of people even those who were opposed to the political views of political men. It was noticeable, for instance, on the day of the funeral that many of the omnibuses and cabs and coaches of London had tied a piece of black ribbon to their whips in sign of mourning; and there were numerous other expressions of respect for Lord Palmerston's memory over part of the working population of the metropolis. It was said that his name, like those of Peel or Cobden, in connected with any particular measure for their benefit; and they have only participated with the rest of the country in the peace and prosperity secured of late years by his prudent administration.

This being the universal state of feeling, it would have been a severe disappointment to all the Londoners if they had been deprived of an opportunity of greeting with silent observance the funeral procession of the one popular statesman and parliamentary leader of the present time, whole country a sort of derogation from the respect due to this great office of dying and in the actual possession of the Ministry, he had not been buried in that venerable cemetery of the nation which is consecrated to the glories of English history as well as to the sanctities of the Christian faith. Mr. Cowper had, we believe, expressed to his wife, had directed the interment to take place at Romney, on the Tuesday or Wednesday; the original wish of Lord Derby, that it made his arrangements; and the grave was actually dug, or the vault opened, in the Romney Cemetery, on the day of Lord Palmerston's decease, 18th inst. This vault was provided for Lord Palmerston, by his own orders, many years ago. The tomb is in the same vault as that of the old abbey church of Romney; and there also is that of his only brother, Sir William Temple, formerly Governor of Naples. He had died about the time when Lord Palmerston's first Administration came in; and when the restricting intercourse between Naples and Rome, Lord Palmerston then, wishing to preserve the remains of his brother, chose this as the use of this vault, sent the inspector, Mr. F. H. Holland, to report upon it. Mr. Holland, by Lord Palmerston's advice, resolved that, after the interment of Sir William, the vault should be sealed. An illustration of the tomb of Sir William Temple will be given next week. Meantime, it may be remarked that the departure from Lord Palmerston's own house, No. 94, Piccadilly, which he had ordered by his will to take place in this solitary vault in the new cemetery at Romney, and not in the usual manner, a much moment as if he had expected to be laid in the same ground with his parents and others of his kindred, though he had made a strong attachment to the neighborhood of his birthplace and his ancestral seat. It is here, however, remembered that his former place from Romsey to Westminster Abbey was adopted at the express desire of the Queen.

In consequence of this change of plan, the body of Lord Palmerston was removed on the Monday from Brocket Hall, Hertfordshire, to Cambridge House, Piccadilly, travelling by the Great Northern road, through Hatfield, Barnet, and Finchley, in a hearse drawn by four horses and followed by a single mourning coach. On the road the illustrations, on page 445, show, respectively, the setting forth of the hearse from Brocket Hall about two o'clock in the morning, and the arrival in the evening at Cambridge House. The body was been received by the nearest surviving kinsman of Lord Palmerston, his sister's son, the Hon. Henry Sullivan, Rector of Yeaxil, near Lichfield; and by the Hon. Evelyn Ashley, late his private secretary. It was laid out in the dining-room, with no other ornament than a board with sable plumes laid at the head. Only a very few of Lord Palmerston's most intimate friends, and, two or three days afterwards, Dr. Stanley, the Dean of Westminster, were admitted to see the face of the dead before it was inclosed in the coffin which had been previously, however, been employed to take a cast of the features for the use of the funeral sculptor. The undertakers, Messrs. Banting, of St. James's-street, were busied meanwhile in their preparations for the last and most solemn journey, but with no more pomp than the rank of the deceased nobleman and the public character of the funeral obsequies seemed to require. The coffin was cov covered with rich crimson velvet, thickly studded with gilt nails, and having gilt handles, with its lid displaying a large gilt plate bearing the Temple arms, the helmet surmounted by the Garter motto, and the supporters resting upon the Temple motto, "Flectere nesci."

Laid in this grave, but narrow receptacle were the mortal remains of him who had a few days before occupied one of the most splendid palaces that any man—except, perhaps, the Emperors of two or three despotic States—could possibly inhabit, surrounded by all that wealth could, because the British House of Commons and his colleagues, and public opinion, could confer upon him. Those wrought into the most momentous issues for weal or woe of Europe, by the subtle combinations of his long foreign policy of "masterly inactivity" or war; who had more than once been the kingmaker of minor sovereigns; who had held the destinies of Italy, Greece, and Egypt in his merest and legislation; who had reconciled nations abroad, sects and factions at home; who had, during full 40 years and honours, after half a century's responsible service of the State, died with the full and general friendship and of less hostility than any other public man.

THE FUNERAL PROCESSION.

Such was the position of the late master of Cambridge House. The upper part of the Green Park and Piccadilly were crowded on this day with people who stood and watched the passage of the funeral procession and other privileged visitors to the house of death. The Earl of Carnarvon, the Lord Chief Justice of Salisbury, the Right Hon. W. Cowper, the Duke of Argyll, the Duke of Somerset, Earl Granville, Mr. Gardiner, Mr. Charles Wood, Lord Stanley, Lord Brand, and Mr. Evelyn Denison, the Speaker of the House of Commons, were among the first visitors who arrived. Then came also the Lord Chancellor and the Archbishop of Canterbury, who were between Cambridge House and Westminster Abbey. There were the members of the provincial mayors and aldermen, the Trinity House Brethren, the Metropolitan Board of Works, and many of their heads of London, which were to precede the hearse in the long procession to Westminster Abbey. The courtyard in front of the house was guarded by about sixty of the Household Cavalry, who, with their band, had by some forty or fifty sailors belonging to the barges of the Trinity House. Mr. Carlton, the coachman of the late Premier, was the Master, headed by six officers of the Naval Reserve. Along the pavement were the Yeomen Beefeaters of the London Irish Rifles, without their enfields, and wearing their side-arms only, headed by Captain Hall. The late Lord Palmerston had been an honorary member of the London Irish corps. At twelve o'clock precisely the hearse, drawn by six horses, with plumes on their heads and caparisoned with black velvet housings, which were embalmed with heraldic devices, drew up at the door in the courtyard. The arms of the Temple family, combined with those of the wife of the deceased, were displayed on each side of the hearse, and those of the Trinity House on the hammercloths, and those of the Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports, the whole effect being somewhat too glaring for the vehicle of death. The coffin, covered with the Union Jack, was borne from Cambridge House by Temple, Viscount Palmerston, K.G., G.C.B., Born, Oct. 20, 1784, died, Oct. 18, 1865." The pall-bearers were the Duke of Argyll, on the shoulders of eight men and put into the hearse, and the procession then started at a slow pace, preceded by the police on horseback.

The foremost part of the long line of carriages, altogether numbering about three hundred, consisted of a set of mourning coaches in which the deputations from various municipal corporations presided the hearse, and which had been given to these belonging to provincial towns, while Tiverton, Hastings, Dover, Romney, and the City of London claimed the places of honour nearest to the bier. The corporations were represented in this part of the line of carriages by the closing usually of a mayor, town-clerk, and one or two aldermen, Messrs. Dodd, Mayor of Tiverton; Mr. Hollingsworth, Mayor of Hastings; Constable, Dover Harbour Board, Stilling, Oxford, Sunderland, Cunningham, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, Fowler, Hull, Crossley, Liverpool, Portsmouth, Southampton, Glasgow, Manchester, Preston, Edinburgh, Tiverton, Plymouth, Bristol, Birmingham, Leeds, Sheffield, the City of Trinity House, and city of London; the last being represented by the Lord Mayor, Sheriffs, Aldermen, and Common Council, with his Chaplain, and the Lord Mayor, with his Chaplain, sword and mace bearers; the Mayor of Romney, and the Mayor of Hastings in their carriages. Then came the naval and military escort, formed by the Life Guards, the escort of the Trinity House; the London Irish volunteers, under Major Hall; the Yeomen Beefeaters, and Captain Enslyn Fleder. The hearse came next. It was followed by seven mourning coaches, in which were the chief mourners, in which were at the mourners—

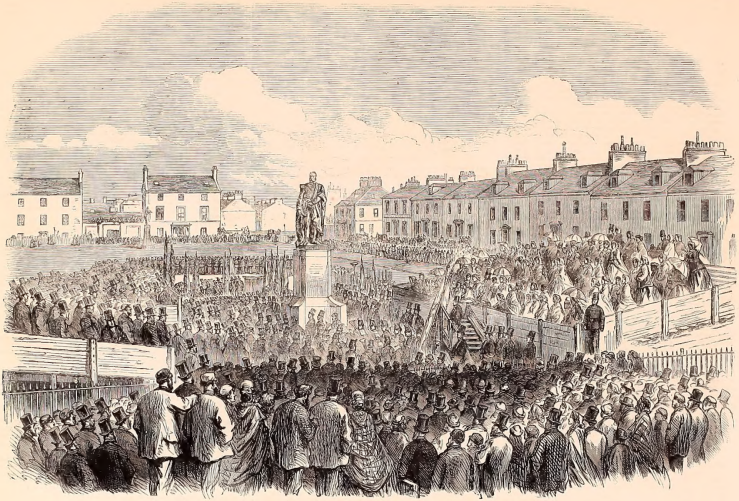
Sir Roundell Palmer, Lord Selborne, Lord Chelmsford, Lord Ripon, the Duke of Somerset, Lord Stanley of Alderley, the Right Hon. E. Cardwell, the Right Hon. C. P. Villiers, the Right Hon. Milner Gibson, Viscount Hardinge, the Right Hon. Henry Brand, Sir Henry Rolls, Sir R. Kindersley, Sir J. Stuart, Sir W. P. Wood, Sir J. Lewis Knight Bruce, Sir G. J. Turner, Sir W. Wightman, Sir G. Shee, the Right Hon. Laurence Sullivan, the Right Hon. Sir Wellington Guise, Sir Fitzroy Kelly, Earl Rosebery, the Earl of Arran, the Countess Dowager of Lichfield, Miss Temple, Viscount Palmerston, Lord Ashley, Sir S. Scott, Lord Henry Montefore, Baron Rothschild, Lady Dimsdale, Earl Spencer, the Hon. H. Elliott, Lady Middleton, the Bishop of London, the Countess of Fife, the Countess of Litchfield, the Marquis of Chandecar, Lord Lyveden, Lord Willoughby D'Eresby, Sir H. Holland, Lord Wenlock, Sir R. Murchison, Major-General Malcolm, and many others.

The route was along Piccadilly, down St. James's-street, along Pall-mall to Charing-cross, down Whitehall and Parliament-street, to the Broad Sanctuary in front of the great west door of the Abbey, where a detachment of the Lothgar a mile and a quarter long, the streets had, of course, been stopped. The side pavements were everywhere crowded; at the windows, in the balconies, and sometimes on the roofs of the houses was a grating multitude. Black drapery bordered the fronts of several of the clubhouses—the Athenæum, Brooke's, and St. James's-street; while the Reform Club, in Pall-mall, had its main doorway hung with a sable curtain, bearing a viscount's coronet and the letter "P," with yellow wreaths of immortelles tastefully festooned together, and the pillars and balustrades dressed in black and white. The Carlton was not in mourning attire, but its members, who mustered in great numbers on the steps or at the windows, saluted with bare heads the funeral of the late Premier, in general sympathy with the solemn illustration of respect above the aspect of the procession as Charing-cross as it turned to go down Whitehall, the long line of the troops of Lothgar-square were being thronged with an immense assemblage of persons, which was a rare feature indeed in the London streets, even when its rear had got well out of Cockspur-street.

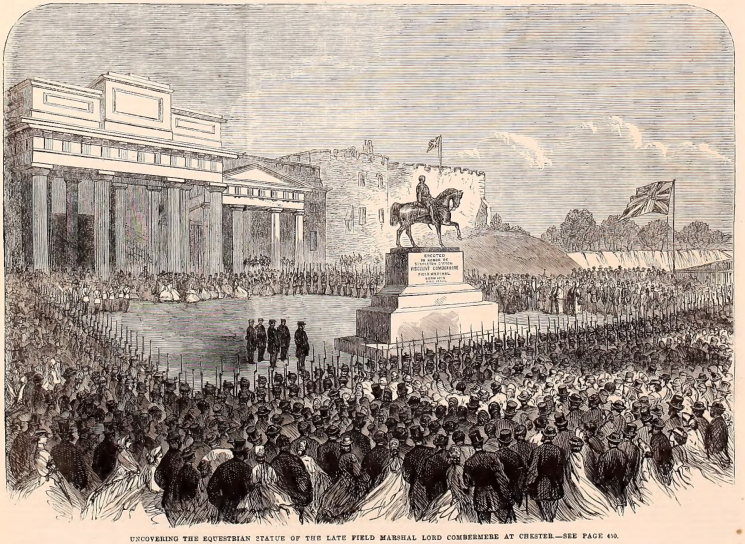
In passing the Government offices it was an obvious recollection that Lord Palmerston for the last few years had been extensively executive business, had been more or less connected with each of the principal departments of the State. Lord Derby, Lord Clarendon, with their window-blinds drawn down, seemed to beckon a gloomy vacation. Mr. Gathorne Hardy, the new First Lord of the Admiralty, in London, it would have been dismal to venture on such a day as this, with the consciousness that none of his dingy houses would ever speak to the lodging or the workshop of his brisk and genial spirit, by which the dull machine of Governmental drudgery was made less irksome and an example of cheerful industry was shown to all the world. Mr. Cardwell, the stately shades of the Colonial Office, the design of which was one of Lord Palmerston's favourite schemes, and the wish that he had lived to see its completion, and a painful sense of the difficulty of providing for the sudden filling up of the vacancy of Baltimore.

But the scene presently became more bright, as the procession moved on through Parliament-street and emerged at the corner of New Palace-yard, where the whole assemblage of the Houses of Parliament arises the grand Victoria Tower, with its superb pinnacles and golden vanes, which glittered in the sunshine of that memorable autumn day, and stands high above the whole metropolis, a symbol of the wealth and strength and glory of the British Empire, and of the stability of the of a free Parliament and the courts of inviolable law. Here the hand a moment to see its composition, set of the magnitude and diversity of the official administration of the country, of the lengthy charge and glorious political Constitution, and of the healthy political morality which enables the most distinguished private gentlemen, princes, peers, and commoners, to devote their best energies to the business of the State, and to receive the given honours and education for that unpaid and laborious task. It is here, in front of the Houses of Parliament, that the people may see the two Houses and gentlemen, born to honours and riches, bred in luxury, fond of pleasure, indolence, and amusement, and who, if they chose to waste in the summer afternoons, or coming at noon, and staying after midnight, devote their lives to the task of the vast and complicated performance of day, dull work, such as the mere reader of debates can hardly conceive it is here that the Ministers and their staff are there will be no want of young English statesmen, endowed with the same high qualities and in the same good school, animated by the spirit of Palmerston, and accustomed, like him, to devote their lives to the public service.



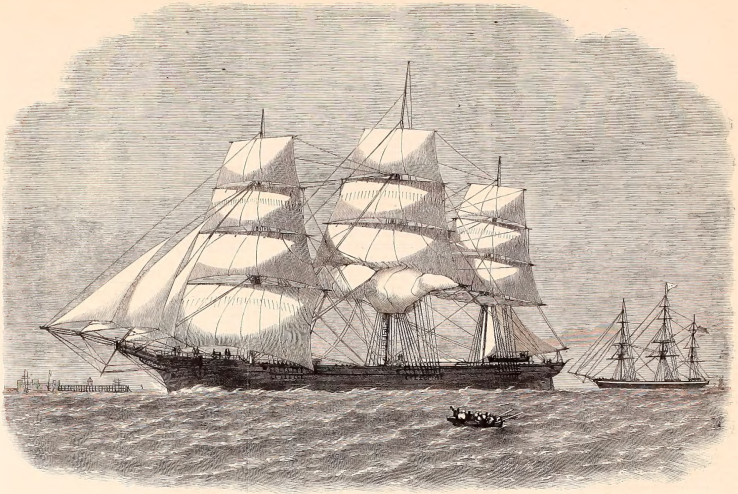
The funeral procession, however, turning away from the Palace of Westminster and the statue of George Canning, which stands in close adjacent to St. Margaret's churchyard, slowly entered the Broad Sanctuary and passed by the great entrance-gate of the Abbey. The mourners, at the principal door of Westminster Abbey. We give an illustration of the Abbey on page 444. It was now about 1 p.m. The canons and aldermen, who mostly wore their robes, and were, in some cases, attended by their own servants, were already assembled, and as they arrived, while their coaches drove away into Victoria street. The mourners began to be received in a double line from the Westminster Hospital across to the Crimean monument of the Guards' memorial, opposite the door of Dean's-yard. The great toll of the Abbey bell was tolled, and the long and enormous assemblage of the people to the stern fact of death, ever relentlessly repeating like a knell the words of the text, "Man that is born of woman." Several thousand persons, of both sexes, of all ages, and of different classes, filled the whole of the open space and saw the proudly-decorated hearse stop at the Abbey door; they saw the crimson coffin lifted out and covered with the pall, and borne on the arms of the men of the Canon Nepean, the Rev. Canon Conway, the Rev. Canon Jackson, the Rev. Henry Jones, M.A., Precentor; the Rev. J. Jepton, the Rev. J. Antrobus, the Rev. J. Troutbeck, and the choristers and vergers, bearing their silver staves trimmed with crape. An illustration of this group is engraved on page 444.

THE FUNERAL CEREMONY.



The central part of the floor of the nave was kept clear and open for the procession to pass through from the west door to the choir, but the side aisles were filled with a closely-packed congregation, all dressed in mourning, amongst whom the pressure to the coffin, as it was borne along, were thirty or forty of Lord Palmerston's servants and tenants, who had come in mourning coaches from Romney, and others who had come to London that morning on purpose to attend the funeral. In the choir, and in the transepts adjoining that part of the congregation: their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales and the Duke of Cambridge, in mourning dress, but wearing the star and ribbon of the Garter, occupied seats on the north side of the choir reserved for royalty, next that of the Dean himself; the Lord Mayor and Sheriffs, with a body of Aldermen of the City of London, having a special place and the representatives of other municipal corporations taking their seats in the south transept, usually called Poets' Corner, a sort of Pantheon of English literature, and draped with black cloth, rising from the floor of the nide almost to the triforium, in which several hundred persons were seated, the Members of Parliament, the Government departments, and military or naval officers of rank, were accommodated in the north transept, and in the part of the transept on northern transept, where the grave of the late Minister was prepared. Amongst the more distinguished in rank were Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar, K.G., the Duke of Cleveland, the Marquis of Chandecar, the Marquis of Normanby, the Earl of Cork, the Earl of Effingham, the Earl of Carlisle, Earl Granville, Earl Cowper, Earl Canarvon, and Viscount Hood, besides a great many well-known members of the House of Commons.

The procession up the nave was formed in this order —The choir, led by the Rev. Canon Jackson, the Rev. Hood Jones, with verger; the Master and scholars of Westminster School; the Dean, the Rev. Canon Conway, the Rev. Canon Nepean, as a verger; the coffin, with the pallbearers, who were, on the right hand, Earl Russell, Sir Charles Wood, Lord Stanley of Alderley, the Right Hon. Sir Earl De Grey and Ripon; on the left hand, the Lord Chancellor, Earl Granville, the Duke of Argyll, the Earl of Clarendon, and the Right Hon. Mr. Gladstone, followed by the Right Hon. Henry Sullivan, chief mourner, with the Earl of Shaftesbury and the Right Hon. Mr. Cowper, followed by the Right Hon. W. Bowyer and the Right Hon. Laurence Sullivan, brothers-in-law of Lord Palmerston; Mr. Henry Hippisley, Mr. Evelyn Ashley, Mr. Lionel Ashley, Mr. William Temple, the Hon. Spencer Cowper, Earl Cowper, the Hon. Henry Cowper, the Hon. Evelyn Ashley, the Hon. Lionel Ashley, the Hon. Cecil Ashley, Lord Jocelyn, the Hon. Fred. Jocelyn, Viscount Sackley, Viscount Bury, and Lord Palmerston, M.P., the deceased nobleman's nearest mourners were Viscount Bury (representing her Majesty), the Duke of Cambridge, the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Speaker of the House of Commons, and the Lord Chamberlain.



Having reached the choir, while the opening sentences of the burial service were chanted to Dr. Croft's music, the mourners in the procession took their seats along with the party of a hundred and fifty peers and gentlemen who had been invited to take part in the ceremony, and who had come from Cambridge House in the mourning-coaches, assembling in the Jerusalem Chamber. The following is the official list of those invited, but it should be observed that several were absent, amongst whom were Lord Derby and Lord Russell:—His Grace the Archbishop of York; the Marquis d'Azeglio; the Duke of Cleveland, K.G.; the Marquis of Hartington, M.P., the United States Minister Rhamilton, Mr. Kincaid, Mr. James Murray, Mr. Nicholl, Mr. A. Daniels, and Mr. Waddington.

When the procession stopped in the choir the pallbearers withdrew a pace or two, and the coffin was placed on the tressels covered with eagle tecken usually stand; the first parts of the service, the psalms and lessons, then proceeded with the accompaniments plain and chanted to Purcell's music, and the fifteenth chapter of the First Epistle to the Corinthians read by the Rev. Dean, after which the Funeral March of Beethoven being played by Mr. Turle on the organ with solemn effect, the coffin was again raised and carried through the gates into the north transept. The scene in this part of the Abbey, where the final act of interment took place, was one of much larger foregraving, which occupies the two middle pages of this Paper. The vault in which the body of Lord Palmerston was to rest was opened to view in front of a huge monument of white marble erected to the memory of three naval officers who were killed in a powder light under Admiral Napier's command before Lord Palmerston was born. But this is properly the Statesmen's Corner; for Lord Chatham, his son William Pitt, and Charles James Fox are buried there, on the right hand of Palmerston; while Canningwho, by many colleagues, one of the most brilliant men of Vienna, and Wilberforce, from whom he imbibed his uncompromising hatred of the slave trade, lie on his left hand; and not far away is also the grave of Canning, who, more than any other statesman, contributed, by his leadership, by his maxims, and by his counsels, to the political course of our great English Minister. On the brink of the grave into which Lord Palmerston, the latest follower of these illustrious statesmen, was about to descend, his coffin was met by the most distinguished, while the surviving members of the Cabinet and the nearest relatives of the deceased took their places around the grave. Dean, at his reading-desk above, waited until the singers, ranged on a platform at the north side of the transept, had sung the anthem, and the solemn sentences of the burial service which are set to the most solemn and affecting music; and when the coffin was lowered through the Abbey, the coffin was lowered into the vault; the mourners, drawing jewelled rings from their fingers, cast them in—a fond token of affection for the dead; the voice of the Dean was then heard, uttering "Forasmuch as it hath pleased Almighty God to take to Himself the soul of our dear brother here departed," and to on with the rest of the service, which every one of the readers knows by heart, and the saddest sounds in the world to which none who have so heard it will ever forget. Then the choir sang Handel's noble anthem, "His body is buried in peace, but His name liveth for evermore." As this ended, the soft light of a fine day, which had streamed for hours through the rich stained glass of the venerable Abbey, was suddenly exchanged for the deep gloom of a starless night. The ceremony was then closed with a benediction from the Dean; and, while the "Dead March" in "Saul" pealed from the mighty organ, the congregation slowly dispersed.

TIVERTON, DEVON.

THE borough town of Tiverton, in Devonshire, which has had the honour of giving Lord Palmerston his seat in the House of Commons for the last twenty years, is pleasantly situated on the river Exe, about fourteen miles from the city of Exeter. It stands on a rising ground at the confluence of the Exe with a smaller stream called the Lowman, in the midst of those round green hills, planted with tall elms along the hedgerows, and diversified by the occasional copse of young oak and ash, which form the characteristic scenery of that part of England. The Lowman, itself, which has a pretty course of its own, joining the suburb of Westexe, on the opposite bank of the river, is not only the market of a fertile agricultural district, but also the seat of some branches of manufacturing industry; and the lace factory of Mr. Heathcoat, removed to this spot about forty years ago in consequence of the Luddite riots at Nottingham and Leicester, gives employment to several hundred persons. The principal streets are well paved and kept very clean, and are of good fresh water, as in the main street of Honiton and other west-country towns; running continually beside the pavement. One of the most striking features of the neat streets of Tiverton, and contributes, perhaps, to the salubrity of the air. The steep banks of the valley of the Exe, by the most part occupied by the back gardens of the best houses in the town, have a picturesque appearance in the view from Westexe, from the bridge as he enters Tiverton by the Exeter road; and are no less attractive when looked higher up from the churchyard, which crowns the meadows beneath. The View we have engraved was taken from the ground on the north side of the Exeter-road street. It shows the new Townhall, not far from the bridge; St. Peter's Church, rising behind. On the left hand is the river Exe, the old stone bridge, two arches of which appear, and also the farther side of the river in Westexe, with the lace-factory. On the right hand is the railway station, with the engine-house, modeled with a short branch of the Bristol and Exeter line. The manufactures of this borough town, which we believe, are more than 470 electors, but it is privileged with as large a share of political power as either city of Westminster, or that of London, or any borough of Ireland, of the great, wealthy, and populous towns of Manchester, Birmingham, Liverpool, and Glasgow. Lord Palmerston had no property or family connection in the neighbourhood of Tiverton, but all classes of the inhabitants were proud of him as their representative; and his affable manners, of which they had enjoyed frequent experience in his occasional visits to the town, endeared him personally to the whole of the Tiverton community. We first returned for the constituency in June, 1835, and his seldom or never been seriously opposed as a candidate for one of the two which Tiverton has the bestow. The Hon. George Denman, his late colleague, who was defeated by Mr. Worrall at the late election, is likely to be Lord Palmerston's successor.

KELSO, ROXBURGHSHIRE.

On the recent occasion of the visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales to the Duke and Duchess of Roxburghe, at Floors Castle, we gave a View of this mansion; and we now present one of the town of Kelso, from which Floors Castle is distant scarcely a mile. This town is beautifully situated, at the confluence of the Tweed and the Teviot, but on the left or north bank of the Tweed, thirty-eight miles north-east of Edinburgh. It was originally a dependency of the ancient town of Roxburgh, which was destroyed in the Scottish Border wars of the fifteenth century, but the site of the old town is now called Oxnie, just opposite to Floors. The present town has a population of above 6000, with a market of some importance, and many interesting architectural remains; it is the abbey, founded in the twelfth century partly of the Norman and partly of the Early Pointed Gothic style. The poet Thomson was a native of Jedburgh, a market town Kelso.

THE COTTON-SHIP GLAD TIDINGS AT LIVERPOOL.

THE reopening of the American cotton trade this summer has been hailed with grateful joy by many thousands of the working population of Lancashire, and cannot be regarded otherwise than as a great and happy deliverance for the cotton-manufacturing districts of England, irrespective of the results of the Northern victory in the United States, whether as putting an end to the miseries of civil war or as procuring the abolition of negro slavery. It may be presumed that it was by way of expressing congratulation and sympathy with these feelings that the owners of some of the vessels which have lately arrived with cargoes of cotton in the port of Liverpool have thought proper to give them each names as "The Glad Tidings," a ship of that name having entered the Mersey from one of the American ports not many days ago. We present an illustration of this vessel, with another called "The Freedom," also bringing American cotton, and we have no doubt that many more will soon receive their arrival as auspicious token of future peace and liberty for the world as well as of prosperous commercial intercourse between America and Britain.

THE EGLINTON MONUMENT AT AYR.

A STATUE, by Mr. Noble, of the late Earl of Eglinton, who died in October, 1861, was recently inaugurated in the Wallace Tower, in 21st ult., in Wellington-square, in the town of Ayr, with Masonic and other ceremonies and an inaugural address and speeches delivered by Lord Colville, chairman of the Eglinton Memorial Committee; the Marquis of Ailsa, Lord Lieutenant of Ayrshire, the Provost of the town of Ayr, and other gentlemen of local importance. The procession assemblage, including all the rank and fashion of the county, having been brought from the Eglinton Arms. Our illustration is from a photograph by Mr. David Campbell, of Ayr. The statue and pedestal have a fine effect, the figure being of colossal size and displaying a good likeness of his Lordship, wearing his uniform as Lord Lieutenant, with the Star of the Most Illustrious Order of the Garter, and with the insignia of the orders of the Thistle and St. Patrick. A statue of Eglinton's brother, also the work of Mr. Noble, stands in the same town not long ago. The subscriptions to the Eglinton memorial, having amounted to £1200, the surplus, which is £1800, will be invested to provide Eglinton fellowships in the University of Glasgow. Lord Eglinton having been Lord Rector of that University.

THE COMMEMBERE MONUMENT AT CHESTER.

THE equestrian statue erected in front of the castle gate at Chester in honour of the late Field Marshal Lord Combermere was publicly uncovered on the 26th ult., and on the 27th was inaugurated immediately afterwards, the foundation-stone of the new Townhall of Chester was laid by the Duke of Westminster, the event having taken place before ceremony in the good old town. The weather was, unfortunately, very wet during the day. With regard to the statue, which will be a very handsome work of architecture, from the designs of Messrs. Lanyon and Lynn, of Belfast, it is to be observed that it is not, on occasion, but to promise a View of the building when it shall be completed and ready for public use. We give an illustration of the statue at the present time. The procession, formed at the procession, formed at the savings' bank had conducted the managers of the monument to the Commemberre Monument, the Mayor and Corporation Grosvenor, Lord Combermere, Sir Watkin W. Wynne, the Mayor, the Bishop of Chester, Major-General Mayne, Major-General Jones, the onete-square, which was guarded by the following military detachments:—1st Battalion 17th Regiment (Leicestershire), detachment of Colonel King; 6th Cheshire R.V., (Chester), commanded by Captain Hamilton; 1st Cheshire R.V., (Nantwich), commanded by Captain Evans; a detachment of the 64th Regiment, commanded by Major Francis; a detachment of the Cheshire Militia, and the Cheshire Ice Brigade. The statue, by Mr. Matthew Noble, Earl Grosvenor, made a speech concerning the gallant services and characters of the late Lord and Sir Randolph, who fought his earliest battles in Spain. The statue was then uncovered, the troops presented arms, the bands played, and the Mayor declared the town of the city rang a merry peal, indicating that the ceremony was concluded. The statue is equestrian, and of bronze. The likeness was considered correct, and the monument, as a whole, was much admired. The gallant Field Marshal is dressed in the full uniform of a cavalry head is bared, and he is in the act of giving a salute. The height of the statue is 12 ft.; the pedestal is the same. The cost of the erection, subscribed by the inhabitants of Cheshire, is upwards of £1000, and of this sum £3000 has been paid to the artist, Baron Marochetti. The pedestal bears the following inscription:—"This statue is erected in honour of Stapleton Cotton, Viscount Combermere, Field Marshal, Knt. of the Most Hon. Military Order of the Bath, Knt. of the Most Hon. OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS.

VISCOUNT GORT.

The Right Hon. John Prendergast Vereker, third Viscount Gort, of Limerick, Baron Kiltartan of Gort, in the county of Galway, a representative peer of Ireland, and Colonel of the city of Limerick Regiment of Artillery, was the elder son (and the only son by his first wife, Jane, widow of William Skeaver, Esq., of Attyflin) of the gallant Charles, second Viscount Gort, who distinguished himself by his brave resistance, at Coruña, against the superior forces of the invading General Romberti, and was rewarded with a grant of supporters to his arms and the motto "Colonorum." His only brother, Captain the Hon. Standish Vereker, was born in 1794, and died unmarried. He had been highly creditable and somewhat cruelly. He went very early to Harrow, then famous under Dr. Drury, and remained there until he was "head of the school." He began as Lord Bryce's fag, and Lord Palmerston was still at Harrow then, and Lord Carne, Sir Robert Peel, Lord Delaware, and many eminent men were among his schoolfellows. Before leaving Harrow he was nominated to a Lieutenancy in the Limerick militia, then commanded by his father, who had led the corps, as stated, victoriously against the French at Coruña in 1809. He will be was promoted to the rank of Captain in the militia in 1840, so that has been a field officer for more than half a century. The corps was embodied in 1793, and has been so ever since, with the sole break with it for four years subsequent to 1815, which it was marched to Cork for embarkation, having volunteered for foreign service. Lord Gort was a gentleman-like man, of the military stamp, and his manners were those of the first connected the representation of Limerick, which was rendered vacant by his father's succession to the Peerage, and which had for a quarter of a century been a warmly fought for by the rival noble houses of Gort and Limerick. He was on three occasions elected after very keen and costly contests, but on the third election a committee, unseated him, and gave the seat to the Earl of Limerick's son-in-law, Mr. Spring Rice, now Lord Chancellor of the Exchequer, and now Lord Monteagle. When this decision of the House of Commons was given, Lord Gort resigned his seat, and on the very next day of equally obstinate contests were. After this, Lord Gort, since Major Vereker, spent his time in the country, and was a great patron and appreciate members of art and virtue, some valuable pictures having been collected. In 1850 he returned to Ireland, and took henceforth a very active part in all the duties that devolve on a resident landlord and magistrate. A stout, cheerful and ornamental appearance of the town of Gort still bears testimony to his taste for improvements in its trees. He succeeded his father as third Viscount, Nov. 11, 1842. His beautiful seat, Loughcoose Castle, in the county of Galway, and the grounds of that Irish estate, have undergone many ages, and his Lordship has since resided altogether in England—latterly at his seat, near Downton Castle, in Herefordshire, which he has altered from that of a regency mansion. For in the House of Lords, for which he was lately elected by a large majority, he was a constant attendant. The present Gort married, Dec. 16, 1854, Maria, eldest daughter of Lord Dunsandle and Clanconal, first Viscount Guillamore, by whom, who died in 1861, he has issue a son, Charles, who died young; Standish, Captain in the Grenadier Guards; John Prendergast, late Lord Mayor of Dublin; Henry Prendergast, LL.D., British Consul at Charleston; Prendergast Guillamore, lieutenant and quartermaster, who, of note in the Chinese War, died at Rangoon in April last; and Adolphus Edward Prendergast Gorat, Captain in the 29th Foot, a distinguished European officer, who died at Yokohama in 1864; and five daughters, of whom three survive; the youngest of them, Emily Henrietta, is the wife of the fifth Baronet Baker, Bart., of Trebby Park, Cornwall. Maria Corinna, Lord Gort's third daughter, married, in 1861, Lieut.-Col. Frederick Standish Vereker, 60th Rifles, and died in 1864. Lord Gort married, secondly, June 10, 1861, Elizabeth Mary, daughter of John Jones, R.N., and widow of Captain Hugh Seager, R.N., and by her (a Yorkshire lady, which help to make her Ladyship a Yorkshire woman) he has left a son, Cecil Charles Jane, late of Wight, who has been for many years a resident of Gort, who was born July 5, 1819, and who served the office of High Sheriff of the county of Galway in 1844. By his second marriage he has left a son, Rev. Rich Millik. He married, May 4, 1847, Caroline Harriett, third daughter of Henry Gough, Viscount Gough, and has a family of four sons and five daughters. The family of Vereker, which in the male line Lord Gort represents, though of the most remote antiquity in Normandy, has been settled in Ireland since the 16th year; but the title and estates of Gort come to the Verekers, in the 18th century, through Lord Gort's great-grandmother, Elizabeth Gough, whose ancestor, Maurice, Lord of Prendergrast in Pembrokeshire, "a rights valiaunte Captain," according to Holinshed, was one of the most prominent promoters of Strongbow in his invasion of Ireland. Maurice de Prendergast, after the victorious result of the venture, obtained an ample share of the conquered lands in Ireland. He eventually gave the castle of Prendergast in Wales to the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem, and, joining their order, died Prior of Kilmainham in 1176. From his eldest son, Philip, the Prendergast passed through many goodly generations to Sir Thomas Prendergast, first Baronet of Gort, so created in 1661. Sir Thomas's grandson, Sir Thomas Prendergast, the second Baronet, Postmaster General of Ireland, married Grace, his sister's son). Sir Thomas's son, Sir Thomas Prendergast, Bart., with no relation to his nephew, Charles Vereker (his sister's son), who accordingly succeeded as second Viscount, and was father of the nobleman just deceased.

THE DOWAGER VISCOUNTESS HARDINGE.

The Right Hon. Emily Jane, Dowager Viscountess Hardinge of Lahore, whose death has just occurred, at Belvedere, Kent, was the second wife of Sir Walter Charles James, Bart., her son by her first husband—was the fifth and eldest daughter of Lieut.-General Sir Thomas Staunton, and the eldest sister of the eminent Lord Chancellor, Charles, first Earl Cranbrook, and was sister also of the celebrated Sinologue, Sir George Thomas Staunton, record Marquis of Londonderry, K.G., and of the distinguished soldier and diplomatist, Charles William, third Marquis of Londonderry, K.G., and sister of Frederick Robert William, fourth and present Marquis of Londonderry, K.G. Lady Hardinge was born March 24, 1797, and was married, in 1815, to her cousin, John James, Esq., British Minister in the Netherlands, by whom (who died June 24, 1844) she had issue a son, Walter Charles James, second and present Baronet, and a daughter, Mary Ladysship was married, secondly, Dec. 10, 1821, to the illustrious military commander, Henry, Viscount Hardinge, G.C.B., created, for his brilliant victories in the Punjaub, Lahore, and of King's Newton, Derbyshire, by whom (who died Sept. 24, 1856) she had two sons—viz., Charles Stanton, third and present Viscount Hardinge, and the Hon. Colonel Arthur Edward Hardinge, C.B., Coldstream Guards, Knight of the Legion of Honour, and Commander of the Order of Leopold, the Hon. Frances Elizabeth, is wife of Major-General Arthur Augustus Thynne Cadogan, C.B., third son of the third Earl Cadogan, fifth Baronet, of Wimacrig, Aynsley.

EGERTON LEIGH, ESQ.

Egerton Leigh, Esq., J.P. and D.L., of West Hall, High Leigh, and Jodrell Hall, Cheshire, who died, on the 8th ult., at Belvedere, Kent, in the eighty-second year of his age, was the eldest son of Egerton Leigh, of the West Hall, High Leigh, by his wife, Elizabeth, second cohoiress of Francis Jodrell, Esq., of Yeardley and Jodrell Hall. He spent many years in the 3rd Dragoon Guards; and he afterwards settled at Jodrell Hall, in Mobberley, Cheshire, and Mr. Egerton Leigh, of Grange Stratton, Esq., of Ince Hall, Lancashire, by whom he had six daughters—viz., Eleanor, Anna, Elizabeth, Mary, Emma, and Augusta Caroline (Mrs. Greley); and an only son, Egerton Leigh, the subject of this notice, who married in 1850, Miss Brownlow, a lady who formerly a Captain in the Queen's Bays, and who was for many years a Cheshire Militia. He married Lydia Rachel, daughter and heiress of Samuel Wright, Esq., of Bulcote Lodge, Nottinghamshire, and was formerly an officer in the 1st Royal Dragoons; three other sons, Edward, Neville, and Francis, survive him. The Egerton Leighs of the West Hall are a family of ancient and honourable descent, springing from the Lymans, a line much more ancient still.

MR. JUSTICE CROMPTON.

The Hon. Sir Charles Crompton, Serjeant-at-Law, and first Puisne Justice of the Court of Queen's Bench, a very able and learned lawyer and an excellent judge, who died, on the 30th ult., at his town-house, 29, Hyde Park-square, was a scion of the old and highly-respected family of Crompton, of Derby, lately represented by Sir Samuel Crompton, Bart., a title now extinct. Mr. Justice Crompton was the third son of Peter Crompton, M.D., of Liverpool, by his wife, a daughter of John Greenhalgh, Esq., of Brandlesholme. He was born in 1797, and was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, where he obtained honours in 1814, 1815, and 1816. Having adopted the legal profession, he particularly devoted himself to the study of special pleading, and became one of our most noted masters of the science. He was, in 1821, called to the Bar by the Honourable Society of the Inner Temple, and went the Northern Circuit, where, and in Westminster Hall, his perfect knowledge of law brought him considerable practice and reputation. He was for a long time the leading junior and arbitrating counsel of his circuit. He was for some years one of the editors of the law reports in the Court of Exchequer, with Messrs. Welsby and Jarvis's, and Mr. Crompton's name is on the title-page. He was appointed to the seaserchip of that important civil tribunal the Passage Court of Liverpool in 1836. He was, in 1851, one of the commissioners appointed to hear the proceedings, practice, and jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery. He never sought to be a Common Serjeant, but that situation having been offered to him he was nevertheless elected a Bencher of the Inner Temple in 1851. He, in 1852, was made a Serjeant-at-Law, and in the same year, advanced to the Bench, and Mr. Justice Crompton became with him to the Bench the same professional knowledge and judicial qualities, and similar judicial temperament, which had distinguished him at the Bar. He had long won and ever possessed the respect and affection of all his legal brethren, the Judges, counsel, and solicitors. He had with Chief Justice Campbell, the present Lord Chief Justice Cockburn, married, in 1832, Caroline, fourth daughter of Thomas Fletcher, Esq., of Liverpool, and leaves a family.

LORD PALMERSTON.—A correspondent calls attention that in last week's notice his Lordship's grandfather is incorrectly named Sir John Bernard: it should be Sir John Barnard, Bart., Lord Mayor of London, and Alderman of the City of London, and he was representative for the city of London in its successive Parliaments. He was also a director of the Bank of England during his mother's brother, Benjamin Colman, who was a merchant of Pinchurch-street, and a Bank director, and died Aug. 2, 1796.

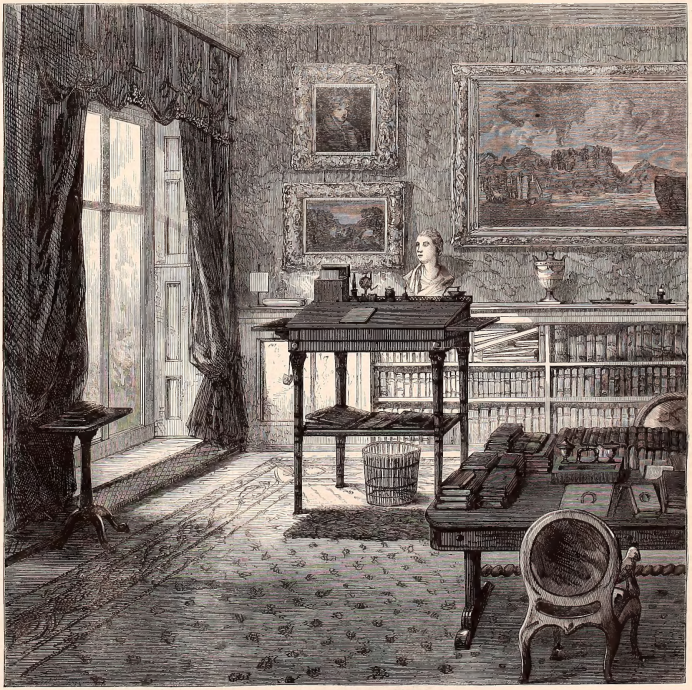
THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.



No. 1342.—VOL. XLVII. SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 11, 1865. WITH A SUPPLEMENT, FIVEPENCE.

THE POLICY OF FRANCE IN ALGERIA.

A PAMPHLET on the above subject, from the pen of the Emperor Napoleon, has just issued from the Paris press. It is in the form of a letter addressed to Marshal de MeMahon, Governor-General of Algeria. A note from the publisher accompanies it, stating that it was printed by order of the Emperor ten days after his return from the colony, but was not then made public, "because his Majesty was anxious that all the questions treated in it should be subjected to a preliminary discussion by the Ministers and the Governor-General." Having weighed objections and made several alterations in the original text, the Emperor now authorises the publication of the document.

The first thought suggested by the appearance of the work relates to the Emperor himself Conceding, for argument's sake, that personal Government, or the direction of public affairs by a single mind, may possibly be best adapted to the genius of the French people, it must be admitted that their present Sovereign is as highly qualified for the task he has undertaken as any individual of the present age. His eye is everywhere; his aims are generally benefactors; his sympathies usually go along with right and justice; his industry is untiring; his courage dauntless; he is not content to reign, he must govern; it is not enough for his ambition to govern, he wishes so to govern that France shall reap substantial benefits from his rule and that the age shall borrow lustre from his name. The system which he has initiated could nowhere find a better exponent than himself. If it fail, it will not be in consequence of the imperfect trial he has had. The best, perhaps, that man could do for it Napoleon is doing. Whilst he lives, it will be vital; when he is gone, it will probably collapse.

The Emperor, as our readers will recollect, recently paid a visit to Algeria, and personally inspected the most important parts of that colony. It is probable enough that much of what he saw was exhibited to him under its most flattering aspect; and that a great deal of that which he would not have been pleased to see was, as completely as possible, kept out of sight. There is no room to doubt, however, that his penetrating, comprehensive, practical glance took in the broad features of the case before him, and that, whatever may have escaped him, in consequence of having been hudded out of sight, the information which he gained sufficed to convince him that Algeria was not thriving under French rule. Indeed, his first sentence confesses as much. "France has possessed Algeria," he says, "for the last thirty-five years; it is necessary that this conquest should become transformed for her an augmentation of force, and not a cause of weakness." His thirteenth sentence tells us the latter—not, certainly, for want of variety of administrative experiment. "Fifteen systems of general organisation have been tried," writes the Emperor, "one overthrowing the other, . . . and producing in the native population and in the minds of the population and very little practical benefit." The revolt of certain tribes in the interior within the last month is a striking perhaps an unexpected, illustration of the Emperor's remark.

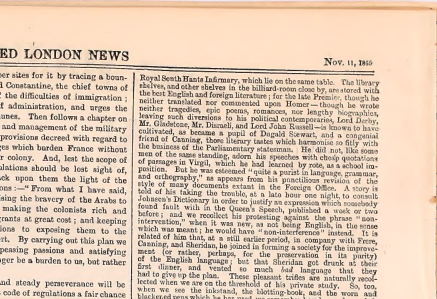
Does Napoleon, then, propose to inaugurate a new system? Not so, he says. He makes no such pretension. He decides in error on general questions, thereby finally excluding them from the controversy, and traces out a new programme, composed almost exclusively of rules of conduct addressed to administrators of all ranks. He cares not to alter the existing machinery: let it remain as it is: he is anxious only to point out the modes in which it is to be made to be applied. Generally, his objects are the following:—"To gain the sympathy of the Arabs by positive acts; to attract new colonists by examples of real prosperity among the old ones; to turn to account the resources of the country as regards men; and by those means to obtain the power of diminishing our army and our expenditure." A right noble programme all will allow, and one well worthy of Imperial sagacity. These are the things really requiring to be done in Algeria, perhaps, the wisest methods of attempting them. One cannot but admire the spirit which prompts the thoughts and guides the steps of the Emperor, and yet one is obliged to doubt the success of the experiment.

The problem which Napoleon is trying to solve is an old one. How to produce a prosperous and peaceful colony in presence of a numerous, warlike, and powerful aboriginal population, from whom it was wrested by force of arms how to reconcile the old inhabitants to subjection, and to suppress in the new immigrants the disposition to oppress them; in a word, how to constitute a happy and thriving community of two races, differing in religion, in traditions, in governmental customs, in social habits, in tastes, in aptitudes and pursuits and even in standards of morality, so that they shall dwell together in harmony under the dominion of the same authority, and pay willing homage to the same code or system of law and policy, is an experiment which cannot be said as yet to have been successfully carried out—at any rate, in modern times. Algeria, unfortunately, even when fairly and honestly expressed in laws and administration, fail of reaching all the inherent difficulties of the case. The antagonisms go deeper than the remedies, and the will of nature has originated what is to be stronger than the will of man. That France can hold Algeria as a conquest nobody will doubt. That the province is capable of being colonised few who are acquainted with its undeveloped resources will deny: but that Arabs and French can so commingle as to give free scope to the genius of both without detriment to either is what, until it becomes an established historical fact, the world will be slow to believe. No one, it is true, is warranted in pronouncing the thing impossible; but it can hardly be said to receive much promise from experience.

The more credit, it may be said, is due to the Emperor for staking upon a doubtful yet so desirable an enterprise his personal credit; and the livelier the interest which society will in France only, but outside of it, will feel in his success. Regulations carefully framed with a view to the welfare of those whom they affect, and even-handed justice in the enforcement of them, are certainly powerful as a talisman in reconciling conquered tribes to a foreign yoke where there is no natural antipathy of the subjugated to the dominant race. Such regulations it seems to have been the study of Napoleon to put forth; and doubtless, he will keep a vigilant eye upon the manner in which they are observed. As to the Arabs, he starts with the declaration that they are French subjects, and have a right to equality in the eye of law. Proceeding on this basis, he enunciates twenty-nine rules for the guidance of administrators, affecting the position of the indigenous race, the conduct to be observed towards them, the state of their lands, the constitution of their tribes, and the administration of justice, taxes, and usury.

The second chapter of the pamphlet is devoted to the subject of colonisation, fixes the proper sides for it by tracing a boundary round Oran, Algiers, and Constantine, the chief towns of the three provinces; treats of the difficulties of immigration; counsels greater simplicity of administration, and urges the enfranchisement of the communes. Then follows a chapter on the organisation, distribution, and management of the military force—the main object of the provisions decreed with regard to which is to diminish the charges which burden France without endangering the safety of her colony. And, last the scope of these numerous and detailed regulations should be lost sight of, the Imperial writer casts his eye upon them the light of the following summary declarations:—"From what I have said, you will see that I prefer utilising the bravery of the Arabs to arming on their account the colonists rich and prosperous to importing emigrants at great cost; and employing our soldiers in healthy stations to exposing them to the destructive climate of the desert. By carrying out this plan we shall succeed, I hope, in speedily, progressively and satisfying interests. Algeria will no longer be a burden to us, but rather a new element of peace."

Of course time, patience, and steady perseverance will be needed to give even the wisest code of regulations a fair chance of permanent success. If the programme of the Emperor fails, its failure will be due, we imagine, to the fact that it grapples with a case that no practical programme can avail to meet. He has done his best. But his views will probably be received in worse world of ours which are too unmanageable for even Napoleonic sagacity to bring under control. We should grieve to be under an obligation to predict that Arab independence will never contentedly set down under a foreign yoke; that French impetuosity will never rear a flourishing colony; but, looking at the undeniable lack of aptitude on both sides, we must confess beforehand that, should the Emperor achieve the object at which he aims, his success will be greater than is regarded as the greatest and most beneficial of which modern times can boast.



LORD PALMERSTON'S STUDY AT BROADLANDS.

Few men whose public labours have controlled the affairs of a nation for so long a period as Lord Derby, when called away from this world, such a lively and agreeable impression of personal temperament and manners as the late Prime Minister. When—amidst the brilliant and exhilarating influence of the united Lady Palmerston and Lord Ponsonmerston kingdom, which had contended twelve years for the freedom of the whole nation, and had merged its existence in the magnificent result—Cavour sickened and died, the people of Turin, a mourning crowd inspired by a thousand conflicting sensations, by an immediate presence, gathered in the courtyard of his house and in the street before it, lingered there for many days through the short-summer night and the sad succeeding day, while it seemed as if the hours were endless, as fresh anecdotes of their beloved and illustrious townsman were produced by every groupe and eagerly repeated by the others. Turin is not a large city, and all its inhabitants—men, women, and children—loved Count Cavour, who had been at home with them all his life, and had been known to them from his childhood. The classes of the population, as Palmerston might have done if he had been an Italian instead of an English nobleman; but the Italian people, at least, of their natural disposition, the two great statesmen were like mind. In the towns of Italy, as in others, where Lord Palmerston was really at home, though he was, in a different sense, thoroughly at home in Downing Street, the Minister's room, and the House of Commons; it is probable that the lamented owner of Broadlands would have left behind him a rare tone of affectionate genius; and we can readily believe the reported words of the Italian people in the streets and peasantry of his estate who came up to his funeral.

In the case of Lord Palmerston, the personal impression has been as near as one can, and even in contemplating, without indiscretion, the second home of a statesman, to be made acquainted with his private and domestic life. The interior of his mansion at Broadlands, full of outstanding and quaint old furniture, a worthy and characteristic old English gentleman, who would have all about him comfortable, pleasant, and homely, and even in matters of taste, with a special attractiveness from the traditions of Lord Palmerston's habits in his family circle. It is not surprising that the interest which such details already belonging to the history of the country, and the love for the memory of the late English nobleman; but also, in a great measure, from the natural disposition, the two great statesmen were like mind. Royal Seats Hants Infirmary, which lie on the same table. The library shelves, and other shelves in the billiard-room close by, are stored with the best English and foreign literature; for the late Premier, though he neither translated nor commented upon Homer—though he wrote leaving such diversions to his political contemporaries, Lord Derby, Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Disraeli, and Lord John Russell—is known to have studied Cæsar, these literary tastes which harmonise so fitly with the business of the statesman. He did not, like some men of the same standing, adorn his speeches with cheap quotations of passages in Virgil, which he had learned by rote at school position. But he was esteemed "quite a purist in language, grammar, and orthography," as appears by his quotations revised of the style of many documents extant in the Foreign Office. A story is told of his having been asked, on the Treasury bench, one night, to consult Johnson's Dictionary in order to justify an expression which he himself found fault with in the Queen's Speech, published a week or two previously; and we recollect his professing against the expression which was meant; he was new, as not being English, in the sense related of him that, at a still earlier period, in company with Frere, Canning, and Sheridan, he had formed a society for the purpose of (or rather, perhaps, for the preservation in its purity) of the English language; but that Sheridan got drunk at their first dinner, and vented so much bad language that they had to give up the idea. The pleasant trifles are naturally recollected when we are on the threshold of his private study. So, too, when we see the inkstand, the blotting-book, and the wax and blackened pens which he has used, we remember how he condemned, the other day, at Romsey, the testimonial presented to Mr. Beck, with the rather queer mis sense good, useful advice upon the value of a pen and legible handwriting. "Let all your letters be perfectly formed and properly joined together in the words; and be sure to make your up-strokes quite distinct, as well as your down-strokes. Would but my colleague Lord Palmerston's simple rule—of the habit of most important matter! Lord Palmerston was especially worthy of remark in his practice as a laborious scribe—so laborious that the huge piles and volumes of official reports, despatches, and correspondence, since his sole pen at the War Office, are said to be the wonder and despair of all the clerks employed in the Record Office. But of daily routine in the open air, and his temperance in eating and drinking, and his love of his recreations, may have saved him from those bodily ailments which beset the man of sedentary life, and which made the Premier's constitutional vigour, soundness and healthy action of the vital organs with the ample flow of animal spirits, and a capacity for hearty enjoyment at eighty years of age. It was one of Lord Palmerston's maxims that he loved to quote of himself. His countrymen are thankful to have had him so long as they had; they would have been pleased to have had him much longer—for the remainder, let us say, of the nineteenth century, or for the remainder of the present century, if that be the preferable era. In general, that a man who will not take care of his own constitution is not fit to be trusted with the constitution of the realm.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, Nov. 9, 1862.

SPITE of the wet, cold weather we have been recently experiencing—weather that causes the Champs Elysées and the Bois de Boulogne to be utterly deserted—that gives an air of melancholy to the gayer portions of this gay city—that destroys the habitual seasonableness of the Parisian—people here are far more cheerful than they were a week or two ago. The theatres are full, the dealers in bonbons The daily number of deaths is now under seventy. The reports from the hospitals are very favourable. Apart from the public works, the barracks of the capital show a marked improvement. For some weeks past timid people have been in a state of nervousness about cholera on the pretended plea that prevention was better than cure, and the early cases of it not coffee and other beverages have been greatly in demand. The streets, too, have reeked with disinfectants, which, no doubt, done good; but, after all, the rain and the sharp cold weather have been the best disinfectants we have had. The temperate man has prevailed may be said to be over. Already have the thousand and one treatises on the subject disappeared from the booksellers' shops, and the advertisements of a myriad of quasi-specifics from the columns of the journals.

The Emperor and Empress drove into Paris on Saturday to see the progress made with the works in the Avenues de l'Empereur and de l'Impératrice Joséphine; and on Sunday the Emperor left by special train for Fontainebleau, to inspect the property of the Prince Napoleon, which, spite of the extreme poverty of the soil, has been brought into a condition of unexpected productiveness. It will be remembered that, a few years ago, the Emperor called attention to the desirability of effecting something to turn the unproductive soil of the Landes and similar districts to some account; and he has shown great interest in the efforts of those landholders who have sought to carry out his views in the Department of France.

An Imperial pamphlet, being a letter on "The Policy of France in Algeria," addressed by the Emperor to Marshal Mac-Mahon, Governor-General of the colony, has appeared at Paris. It forms a pamphlet of twenty-four pages, large octavo, and is accompanied by the following note from the publisher:—

This letter was printed by the order of the Emperor, ten days after his return from Algeria. It had not been made public because his Majesty was anxious that the Imperial intentions should not be subjected to preliminary discussions by the Ministers and the Governor-General. It is after having weighed all the objections and made all the reflections which the subject suggested that his Majesty has authorised the publication of the document.

The work is divided into three parts, preceded by the following prefatory remarks by the Emperor:—

My programme may be summed up in very few words. To gain the sympathy of the Arabs by positive acts; to attract new colonists by examples of real prosperity among the old ones; to turn to account the resources of Africa as regards men, and by those means to obtain the power of diminishing our army and our expenditure.

I will briefly examine what has been done and what is to be done. The population of Algeria is subdivided nearly as follows:—Natives, 2,140,287; Europeans, 192,241; Jews, 34,000. The country is therefore as one and the same time an Arab kingdom, a European colony, and a French province. It is necessary that the Algerian Arab may there three aspects—that is, the colonial, and the military.

The four chapters composing the pamphlet are entitled "Les Arabes," "La Colonisation," "L'Occupation Militaire," and "Résumé." The chapter on the Arabs treats of their position; the measures that ought to be pursued towards them; the regulation of taxes; a just arrangement and distribution of lands; the constitution of the tribes, the courts of law, and all the various questions that can assimilate the Arab to the native of France. The whole of the measures are indicated in twenty-nine articles.

We have had Count Bismarck here again. He has had conferences with MM. Drouyn de Lhuys and Rouher, and private audiences with the Emperor, and a grand banquet has been given to him at the Ministry for Foreign Affairs. On Monday he left for Berlin. Just now the Prussian star would seem to be in the ascendant at the Imperial Court. The band of the Prussian regiment of Pomeranian Fusiliers, which has come all the way from Berlin for the purpose of giving some grand dinner concerts at the Cirque de l'Impératrice, the last of which took place yesterday, has been performing before the Emperor and Empress at St. Cloud, on which occasion the Emperor not only praised the performances, but conversed familiarly in German with several of the musicians, who, when the concert was over, were entertained at a grand banquet in the military riding-school. At the said banquet the healths of the members of the Imperial family were proposed, we are informed, in "touching language." All this has a significance just now, when people are continually talking about a Prussian alliance, knowing, however, all the while that it would be such a one as might be looked for between the tiger and the leopard: still, for the moment, it has a sort of hold on the Parisian mind, which must have its vessels to feed upon.

The Polish General Langiewicz arrived here, from Switzerland, on Monday last. He was received at the railway station by Prince Napoleon, the head of the Polish emigration in Paris, and others of his countrymen. It is believed that he will shortly be conducted properly to London.

There has been some talk of the resignation of M. Fould, Minister of Finance; but gossiping tongues are now stilled, and it is the general belief that the Minister has succeeded in carrying his point with reference to a reduction of the international duties on cotton manufactures of which we shall be made acquainted with in the forthcoming Budget. Economy, point out only to a reduction in the army and navy, but to the abandonment of the Public Works Bill, which last would society grieve the heart of the omnipotent M. Haussmann, and probably bring about threats of his resignation. The Emperor, however, is well aware that Achille Fould is the only man in France who can carry out for him his system to office, hardly a month ago, he has put his finger on an undoubted blot in the French system of finance, and has given it to the office of Receiver-General, and prepared the way to an immense saving of the public revenue.

We had a dual lave the other day, in which, as a matter of course, literary men was one of the principals. The Count Walewski caused in the Revue de Deux Mondes, and the conclusion to wow M. Henri Rochefort in the Figaro staff, and a Spanish officer, who objected to the manner and the pen for some unfancied remarks in the Figaro. The affair, which originated in the columns of the aforesaid comic journal. Shots were two—exchanged without effect, when, the seconds, on the part of Christian Majesty being considered satisfied, the affair came to an end.

A centenarian has just past away in the person of Madame Du Martin Escourge, the father of the Paris bookselling trade and the first general exporter of French literary productions to Leipzig, St. Petersburg, Canada, the United States, Mexico, &c. He was succeeded in business by his eldest son—a young man who, under the name of Adolphe Escourge, is known to fame as joint author, with Frédéric Soulié, of the drama of "Clotilde."

The recent and subsequent representations of Dupree's opera "Jeanne d'Arc," have been put through without any further contretemps. The result is by no means brilliant. The music is in Meyr's libretto interesting, even to a French audience, with whom the subject is of course immensely popular. The libretto is very poor, where the performances take place, is a curiosity in its way. It was built, about a year ago, by M. Millaud, a great speculating writer, and former partner of the unfortunate Mirès, and proprietor of the Petit Journal, and half a score of money-making speculations with which his command of capital has called into successful existence. The Grand Théâtre Lyrique was built to supply the place of the Opera Comique, pulled down which had to go the way of all stone when M. Haussmann so willes it. It has neither does circle, boxes, nor gallery, but consists of one immense pit, divided into three wooden compartments, and is said to be remarkably skilful in defining. For instance, the chief phœa rejoice in the combination of magnificence and cheapness to these is only a couple of francs, while the price of admission to the inferior places is as low as fifty centimes.

It is rumoured that the first work to be brought out at the new Grand Opera will be by Verdi; the first new opera by Auber; and then, and it is understood that Mery has had the libretto confided to his prolific pen.

A new theatre—the Fantaisies Parisiennes—is announced to open on Wednesday next with an opera by Donizetti, "La Sonnette de Nuit."

SPAIN.

We have the gratifying announcement from Madrid that the ravages of the cholera have ceased in that city, and that, on the 15th inst., a bull-fight would not be offered up in the arena to the public amusement of the publicence.

The Minister of Public Works has addressed a circular to the Governors of the provinces in reference to the cattle plague. The Government does not seem to have made up its mind as to what it is but the Governors are urged to exercise the utmost watchfulness in preventing the importation of cattle, hides, or horns, which may carry the infection.

PORTUGAL.

The Cortes were opened, on Monday, by Don Fernando, who took the oaths as Regent. No speeches were delivered.

SWITZERLAND.

The National Council, in proceeding to enter into its revision of the Swiss Federal Constitution, has rejected a proposal for the direct election of the Federal Council by the people and the Cantons.

M. Kunzel, Federal Councillor for Lucerne, has been chosen President of the Confederation for 1863, and M. Pormenod, Federal Councillor for Vaud, is to be Vice-President.

ITALY.

The Florence journals publish a report recently delivered by Signor Sella, Minister of Finance, before his constituents, in which he explained that it would be necessary to increase the taxes. In alluding to the Roman question he detailed the negotiations which have taken place between the Italian and Papal Governments relative to the Roman Catholic Church. He said that he had no doubt that one of the Roman Court the Italian Government would have acted in opposition to public opinion, and that would have led to a rupture of diplomatic concy. He further declared that Italy would honestly carry out the September Convention, and stated that he trusted that the Roman question must be increased without violence. The Venetian question was represented by Signor Sella as one which was not likely to aid in the financial future of Italy he expressed great faith. The Minister concluded with these words, "Let Italy remain moderate and we shall soon enter Venetia."

Rome is pendamores have attached some brigands in Terracina and captured Silvestro, the chief of the band.

AUSTRIA.

The provisional arrangements for a treaty of commerce between this country and Austria have been completed. The draught of the treaty consists of twenty-three articles.

The Imperial authorization has also been given for the commencement of negotiations for a treaty of commerce with France.

The Emperor has offered Mr. Monroe of his functions as Austrian Chancellor for Croatia, and Field Marshal Kuserich von Sombor has been provisionally appointed as his successor.

GERMANY.

A conference of the minor German Powers has taken place at Hanover with reference to the liberation of Prussia and Austria towards Frankfort.

The representatives of Bavaria, Saxony, and Hesse-Darmstadt propose that Austria and Prussia should be asked to consult the wishes of the people of the duchies and to act in accordance with them. Apparently, inshe Austria nor Prussia has the remotest intention of doing anything of the kind, and the proposal made by the Four Powers corresponding for a fortnight decision on the question. It is probable, however, that the Conference will be satisfied with a promise of the same representatives, that steps should be taken to bring about the incorporation of the Schleswig into the German Confederation.

The answer which Frankfort sent to the notes of Austria and Prussia as to the late Congress of Deputies in Frankfort has been published. The Senate tells the two Powers that it does not recognise their right to speak in the manner they did, and adds that the Congress of Deputies violated no law of the free city of Frankfort. Prussia rejoins to this, in effect, that, notwithstanding the protest of the Senate, it does not intend to withdraw any of its proposals, or even to moderate any of her threats. Austria does not go so far, but complains that the Senate, in dealing with the matter, has done what is identical, has attributed to that of Austria expressions which it did not contain. The Senate, in reply, justifies what it did, but accepts the disclaimer of Austria of offensive expressions. It further goes on to say that there have previously been congresses at other places which have not been objected to. In sufficiently suggestive language, the Senate tells Austria that throughout Germany the necessity for a change in political organisation is becoming more and more evident.

DENMARK.

There has been a Ministerial crisis in Denmark. Yesterday week the Rigsraad agreed to the draught of the Constitution as proposed by the committee by a large majority, and the Ministry afterwards tendered their resignation, which the King accepted. His Majesty has entrusted the formation of a new Ministry to Count Frijs Frijsenborg, who undertook the task of forming a new Administration. He has selected his colleagues from among the arishtocrat Ireland party.

On Tuesday the modifications of the Constitution were adopted by an overwhelming majority in both houses of the Rigsraad. The Ministry have given in their adhesion to these modifications and agreed to submit the bill to the Rigsdag.

The Rigsraad was closed on Wednesday by a speech from the President of the Council, Count Frijs Frijsenborg, in hope that the change in the Constitution would prove a favourable basis for a final settlement of the present state of things.

The Rigsraad will reassemble in January, and the Rigsdag on the 20th inst.

GREECE.

M. Deligeorgis has formed a Cabinet; but the King has been compelled, it seems, to promise that Cabinet a dissolution of the present country next spring.

The new Ministry is constituted as follows:—President of the Ministry and Minister of Foreign Affairs and Justice; Grivas, Minister of War; Mavrocnichalis, Minister of Marine; Californos, Minister of Public Worship; Zaimis, Minister of the Interior; Christides, Minister of Finance.

UNITED STATES.

The latest despatches from New York inform us that President Johnson had appointed the 2nd inst. as a day of national thanksgiving.

The correspondence between Earl Russell and Mr. Adams, on the subject of the Alabama's depredations attracts much attention. The New York Times says that the Earl of Russell's despatches fixed the purpose of the British Government, it is impossible that friendly relations can exist between the British Government and the United States.

President Johnson has declared his belief that universal negro suffrage would breed a war of races, but that qualified negroes should be allowed to be enrolled in the militia.

The Secretary of the Treasury has announced that the subscription for the 7-30 loan has reached 200,000,000 dols.

The South Carolina Legislature has assembled, and the Governor's message congratulates the people on the success which will result from the abolition of slavery and eulogises President Johnson's policy towards the South. It also opposes any act tending to the repudiation of the State debt. At the election for Governor and Federal Governor of South Carolina, General Howard has announced, at Charleston, that the Freedmen's Bureau will continue to exercise its authority until South Carolina allows negro testimony in the courts.

The Georgia Legislature has assembled, has organised its House and appointed a committee to memorialise President Johnson to release Mr. Davis and other political prisoners.

The Fenian Congress has remodelled the Fenian organisation, and has appointed a president, a cabinet, a senate, and a house of representatives.

A telegram from Shanghai states that the Taku forts have been evacuated by the allied garrison. There has been a great hurricane at Manilla. Piracy in the Chinese seas is said to be extending.

JAPAN.

The misunderstanding between the Legislative Assembly and Council is now at an end. The Appropriation Bill continues, notwithstanding the best efforts of the Governor in the way of mediation.

NEW ZEALAND.

A telegram from Trieste repeats the intelligence, which appeared in this Journal last week, that the Austrian Government contemplate an East coast of New Zealand between the insurgent Maoris and the colonial forces, and will endeavour to mediate between them.

Sir George Grey, by the advice of the Ministry, has confiscated the land in Taranaki, and has issued a proclamation to that effect.

THE CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.

The Cape mail arrived on Tuesday. The Basuto war had virtually terminated, although it was not finished. The Free Press were quarrelling among themselves, and their President had opened negotiations with the Governor, who was willing to become a subject of the English Government, but was resolute in his determination to refuse to submit to the Dutch. Moshesh had opened communications with the Governor, and had failed.

A scheme was afloat in the Eastern Province for colonising Basuto by the English settlers.

MISCELLANEOUS.

A monument to Melanchton, the reformer and friend of Luther, has been inaugurated at Wittenberg, Saxony, in presence of the King of Prussia.

A St. Petersburg letter states that the Senate, acting as a sort of court of appeal, will public sitting. This is the commencement of the judicial reform not long since decreed by the Emperor.

The inhabitants of Leipsic have re-named one of the streets after Mendelssohn, in commemoration of the 10th anniversary of the great poet's admission as a student at this University.

The Prussian Ministry of War has given certificates for the district of Southampton, awarded by the Oxford and Cambridge University examiners, to the following candidates for commissions in Southampton, by Dr. Hooke, the Dean of Chichester.—On the same day the prizes awarded to the successful candidates at the Royal Military College, Sandhurst, were distributed by Sir Rainchold Hepgesen, M.P., at Faversham Institute.

An ingenious plan for signalling to ships by means of railway stations lightly at night, by means of a transparency of coloured glass, affixed to the carriage lamp, has been invented by Mr. Lewis Harrison, and tried, experimentally, at several stations, between London, of the Great Western, during the past week, and at Brighton between London and Liverpool, on the Lancashire and Yorkshire line.

German paper that the sandbank in front of Heligoland rock has been lately inhabited by rabbits, whose burrowings have undermined the foundations of the lighthouse of that island. The sandbank is not only the bathing-place of the numerous visitors that resort to Heligoland during the season, but is also frequented by the ships that rock against the sea.

On the authority of a despatch received from Halifax, Nova Scotia, it is announced that an insurrection has broken out in the eastern parts of Canada. The Governor had made an urgent appeal for assistance to General Doyle, who is not only commander of the troops in that colony, but is at present temporarily administering the local government. Admiral Hope immediately set sail in his flagship, the Donegal, with a battalion of the 17th Regiment on board, and was to follow immediately. The cause or extent of the outbreak is unknown.

The Alta Californian says the preparations for the commencement of the United States Pacific Telegraph Company's line are completed, and in a few days a large force will commence operations. The new line will have a double wire upon a single set of poles from San Francisco to Salt Lake, a distance of 700 miles. Between Salt Lake and Carson Valley, 200 miles, and the other 300 miles to Fort Kearney, 1,000 miles of wire, including both the St. Louis and Chicago branches, and 6000 miles of wire will be required in its construction.

CHURCH AND UNIVERSITIES.

On Thursday week the parish church of Southmolton, Devon, was re-opened, after having undergone a restoration, at a cost of £800.

The fifth annual meeting of the Huddersfield Church Institute was held, on Tuesday, in the Philosophical Hall, Huddersfield, and was largely attended. The chair was occupied by Lord Stanley.

A new district church, near the railway station at Tedding ton, for the use of the large population springing up in the east end of that parish, was consecrated by the Bishop of London on Thursday week.

The Church of All Saints, Bishop Burton, which has been restored at the cost of £3000, borne by Mr. E. Watt, High Sheriff of Yorkshire, was re-opened, on Saturday week, when the Archbishop of York preached.

On Saturday last a handsome testimonial was presented to the Rev. W. R. Owen, of Holy Trinity, Vauxhall, on his resigning the secretaryship of the Additional Curates' Society. It consists of the photographs of Mr. and his brother curates, handsomely framed in timber, contained in a large and handsome album, made for the purpose, with an illuminated titlepage.

On the 11th ult. the parish church of Llandilaen was opened. It has been restored at a cost of £1000, the chief of which has been borne by the late Mrs. Brooke; £200 the gift of Captain Crew-Reade, R.N.; £100 by Mr. Lloyd, of Gwernant; and £50 by Mr. J. Tyrer Jones. The Bishop of Bangor preached.

On the 24th ult. the parish church of Bathealwall, near Coventry, was reopened by Divine service by the Bishop of Worcester. The church, the Rev. R. Owen, of Holy Trinity, Vauxhall, on his resigning the curacy has been a new pulpit and reading-desk, with other decorations—at the entire expense of Mr. Eaton, of Coventry, whose family in the villages parish are a substantial support in the evening, through the liberality of the Rector.

The Rev. Francis Sim, Simeon and Jodrell was a few days ago licensed to the village of Hockworthy, Devon. Within a few years a new vicarage house, with suitable outbuildings, at a cost of £1000, has been erected by the incumbent, almost at his sole expense, and the work has now been crowned by the completion of a tower completely tall, with the addition of a south aisle. The plans, by C. Durford Greenway, Esq., of Norwich, a relative of the late rector, were kindly presented in contribution for the purpose.

The parish church of Trusham, South Devon, has undergone extensive restoration, and was re-opened for Divine service, on a late date, on Sunday last. The church, which is a very ancient one, has been restored at the cost of £1000, borne by Mr. Sparkes, of Ashton, and Mr. Hayne, of Trusham. The Bishop of Exeter preached in the morning. In the afternoon the rector of the parish, the Rev. Mr. Hayne, delivered his farewell address to his parishioners, after having held the living for the long period of fifty-two years.

THE NEW LORD MAYOR OF LONDON.

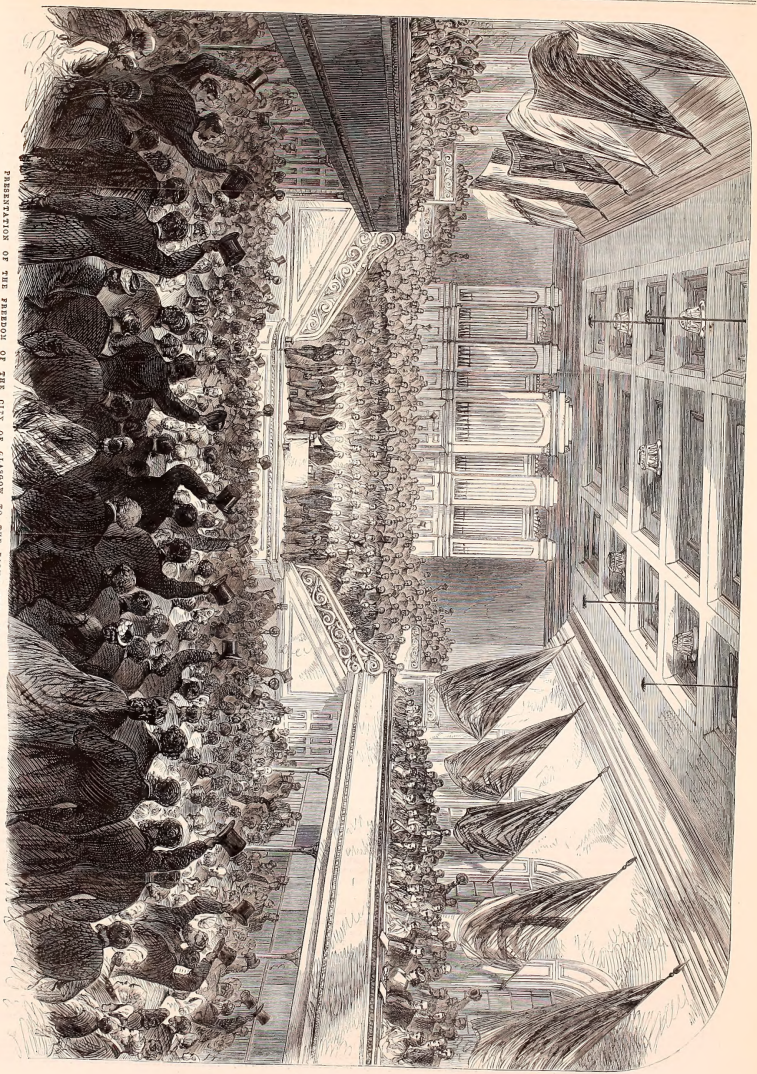
Mr. Benjamin Samuel Phillips, the new Lord Mayor, whose year of civic presidency was inaugurated last Thursday with the usual pomp and festivity, has been a member of the Common Council nearly twenty years, his first appearance there dating as far back as the year 1847, when he was returned as representative of the ward of Farringdon Within. He was at that time thirty-six years of age, and one of the firm of Faudel, Phillips, and Sons, Newgate-street, importers and manufacturers of embroidery and fancy goods, of which firm he is now the head. In his commercial dealings Mr. Phillips had proved himself to be endowed with great common-sense, tact, and judgment, while his business habits and unblemished reputation for integrity, as well as the interest he took in public affairs, recommended him to the confidence of his neighbours as a candidate for their representation in the City councils. After serving in the Court of Common Council ten years, a vacancy occurred in the representation of his ward in the Court of Aldermen, by the resignation of Mr. Alderman Eagleton, and Mr. Phillips had so far advanced in public favour as to be chosen to fill the position thus left open. Two years later he was appointed to fill the office of Sheriff, his companion being Mr. Alderman Gabriel. Having discharged the shrievalty with credit, his assumption of a more prominent office than he has yet filled will be regarded with general satisfaction. Being a member of the Jewish persuasion, and the first Jew admitted into the municipality of London, he will be the second Lord Mayor of that faith, the first being Alderman Salomons. He has more than once shown his practical sympathy with the wants of his brethren, as well as those of every other denomination. He is a member of the Spectacle Makers' Company.

We have engraved the Portrait of his Lordship, in his robes of office, from a photograph by Messrs. Mayall.

The new Sheriffs, Mr. S. J. Gibbons and Mr. James Figgins, are likewise to be mentioned here. Mr Alderman and Sheriff Gibbons is a member of the firm of Todd, Crookes, and Gibbons, wholesale tea-dealers, St. Andrew's-hill, and also carries on an extensive hop trade in the Borough. Having taken considerable interest in parochial affairs, for which he seems to have evinced a very decided aptitude, Mr. Gibbons was returned as Common Councilman for Castle Baynard Ward in 1858, and in this position acquitted himself so well that, on the retirement of Sir Henry Muggeridge, he was chosen to succeed him as Alderman, to which office he was elected on the 13th of March, 1862. The year prior to this he had been appointed chairman of the City Lands Committee. He has lived in the ward which he represents between thirty and forty years. He holds a leading position in the Salters' Company.

Mr. Sheriff Figgins, of the well-known firm of V. and J. Figgins, type-founders, West-street, Smithfield, is a genuine citizen, having been born in West-street, in a house just taken down for railway improvements. The family to which he belongs is a very old one, and amongst his ancestors were five gentlemen who filled the office of Mayor in the town of Devizes, on different occasions—viz., in 1676, 1690, 1701, 1782, and 1792. He has not till lately taken any prominent part in public business, except the performance of the duties of churchwarden. In June, 1865, he was unanimously chosen a Common Councilman—an office which his father had held for twenty years.

THE RIGHT HON. BENJAMIN SAMUEL PHILLIPS, THE NEW LORD MAYOR OF LONDON.



COLOMBIA MARKET, BETHNAL-GREEN.

Amidst the vast increase and embellishment of the metropolis, it is gratifying to find that the great work of sanitary improvement is not neglected, but goes on satisfactorily in every direction. While millions are expended in the removal of old buildings and erecting in their places mansion-like premises of almost palatial pretensions; and localities are thus, as it were, regenerated, and miles of streets, and new neighbourhoods, are added to "the province covered with houses;" the improvement of the old spots—in too many instances plague-spots—proceeds with alacrity.

Bethnal-green and its neighbourhood, which in song and in story, in romance and reality, has been for centuries darkened with the poverty of its toiling population, has of late years received much of this philanthropic attention. Waste ground has been cleared of unhealthy huts, and streets of houses built thereon. Within ten years have been built as many districts churches; the result has brought many improvements; a picturesque park has been provided for the recreation of the people, and much of the squalor and evident misery of the place have been abated; meanwhile, the number of middle-class houses has vastly increased and the general prosperity advanced.

Much of this good work has been wrought by individual philanthropy; and the same munificent hand has provided for the spiritual wants of the district. has placed the necessary curates in the people's park, and has caused to be built large blocks of improved dwellings for the working classes. Now, however, he has entered on an architectural report of last year—"The additional blocks of dwellings erected by Miss Burdett-Coutts' model plan have been for some time finished and filled. Miss Coutts has already spent £50,000 here, and provided comfortable accommodation for 200 families; and we understand she has directed another large block to be built, just beyond the former, but with an open space intervening." This new addition is intended for a public market, to be called "Columbia Market," a portion of which is represented in the accompanying illustration.

The lodging-houses are situated to the left of the Hackney-road, in Bethnal-green, a long and not very lively street, almost entirely from birdcage-makers living here, this being an old locality for birdcatchers, though we are within a short distance of Shoreditch Church. The new market, which is in part built, will be at about the distance of 100 ft. westward of the lodging-houses. It will be in the form of a parallelogram: the east and west sides each 210 ft., and north and south 45 ft. 6 in.; the inclosed area being for the open market. The west side is nearly completed, and its outer façade is shown in the Engraving; the east side, to correspond, is commenced. The north side will consist of a large market-hall and covered market, which will also flank the lodge for the clerk of the market in the southern front.

It will be sufficient to describe the west side, here engraved. It consists of a central tower and two wings, and six intervening dwellings and shops. Each wing contains four flats, or residences, and each flat a sitting-room, three bed-rooms, a kitchen, scullery, store, and closet; the dust will be conveyed away by shoots, and a supply of water will be good. The interior area, or market-place, will be surrounded by an arcade, upon which will be placed the shops, with open balconies of stonework.

The style is of the English of a good period; and the outer façade, here engraved, is more embellished than the inner. The material is fire brick, and stone finishings; terra-cotta is also employed in the arch mouldings and groinings very successfully. The details of the work are picturesque. The upper portion of the tower is highly ornamental also, with the roof-erestings and decorations of shaken a very effective competition, judiciously broken in the line. The tower will contain the machinery for the supply of water to the dwellings; and will be very liberal, which is most essential for market purposes, as well as for private use.

The shops surrounding the market will, we believe, be let for various trades. The plan of management is not known; but is apparently matured for us to state the details. But we are enabled to say that the object of the undertaking is to confer a benefit upon the neighborhood in ensuring to it a market, which shall present the advantages of good supply, with the unfailing adjuncts of cleanliness and sanitary regulation, which are special features of the plan. Some of our old markets have been and failures in these respects; but, with our improved constructive skill and improved appliances with the best means of insuring the public health, we ought to succeed. Convenient approaches to the market will be made from the Hackney-road and from Bethnal-green, the latter by a road to be called Columbia-street.

This new market has been designed by Mr. Darbishire, architect, Tredegar-square, who designed the adjoining model lodging-houses, and the other cottages which are included in the model Columbia Village, Hughstie-rise. For our inspection of Columbia Market we have to thank the obliging clerk of the works, Mr. H. Welker. The builders are Messrs. Cubitt and Co., of Gray's-inn-road.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON: SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 11, 1865.

STILL our Cabinet, which was to have rearranged itself as adroitly and symmetrically as the figures in a kaleidoscope do at a half turn of the wrist, remains incomplete. At length the Lords of the Treasury have been gazetted; and so has Lord Clarendon as Secretary of State. But more rearrangements are required. It appears to have occurred to the Premier that, as there is now nobody in the House of Commons whose explanations of all subjects—civil, military, or naval—are accepted as a matter of course, and whose "He hath said it" is as final as that of Pythagoras, it may be expedient to have somebody in that House who can give the real and satisfactory answer to questions. The strength of the Cabinet is certainly concentrated in the Upper Chamber. We have there the Premier, the Chancellor, the Foreign Secretary, the War Secretary, the Privy Seal, the President of the Council, the Postmaster, and the First Lord of the Admiralty; while in the Commons we have only the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Home, Colonial, and Indian Secretaries, and the Presidents of the Boards of Trade and Poor Laws. Considering that it is the House of Commons that finds the money for national purposes, it does seem somewhat inconsistent with the theory of the Constitution that, in addition to the Minister who has to ask for all the money, there is no person of first-class position to tell the Commons what is done with the supplies for which they are so graciously mulcted.

Something may be said also about strength in debate, though we must confess that we do not think the grievance in this respect is so great as it is represented. It is true that the Lords may be asked to mount too many guns in the House of Lords, considering the array on the other side. There is no such debater as Lord Derby in or out of Parliament. Lord Macaulay has written and left in the world of him that his knowledge of the science of Parliamentary defence surpasses its mistake, and the historian has ranked the Earl, in this regard, with the strong men of other days. But, with this remarkable exception, there is no very formidable orator on the Opposition side. Lord Granville or the Duke of Argyll could give a very satisfactory answer to any of the present aristocratic candidates for office. Lord Ellesborough can make a fine and fiery harangue—"it is splendidly wrong," as one of him said of the heading and glorious charge which we shall all recollect while we recollect anything. Lord Malmesbury is not a very terrible foe for Lord Clarendon's steel. Even if Lord Westbury, being out of office, should not find his tongue, Lord Chelmsford will not have it all his own way, especially if Sir Alexander Cockburn receive the peerage which his talents would adorn. Lord Brougham may be said to be without a portfolio, but he will probably advise the Opposition, and will certainly strike both sides to admire certain penny periodicals, as certain for getting a tribute to Mr. Charles Knight, who has done so much for Lord Brougham's reputation and for the education of the people. Lord Stanley is, to be honest, taken out of the main vice of questions, and cannot be regarded as an enemy. In fact, the batteries of the aristocratic part of the Ministry may seem to have been made needlessly strong, though the fault is, of course, on the right side, provided other interests are not impaired. But when we come to the Commons, although it is true that, with a splendid exception, there is no brilliancy combined with power in the front bench of the Ministers, there are good fighting men among them; and, when Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Disraeli have withdrawn, like Tancred and Argentes, to fight à outrance, the other combatants are very well matched, so far as mere strength goes. Sir Bulwer Lytton delivers an admirable oration, full of power and point; but he is not a party debater, ready for instant grapple. Lord Stanley is too philosophical and too conscientious to fight the reckless battle of party. Sir John Pakington and Sir George Grey may be set against each other, the latter having the best of it generally; and the lawyers are not unequally matched, the Attorney-General's higher intellect not giving him the superiority he might easily assert were his temperament different, and, moreover, when he joined the Ministry he took care to remind the country that he joined in a sense only, and not as a devoted partisan. On the whole, we think that, on making up the accounts, the consideration of debating strength would not need to be entertained, but for the constitutional reason which has been adverted to. Those who have the chief and direct responsibility for the enormous military and naval estimates ought to be in their places in the Commons to answer concerning those vast expenditures.

It is easier to point this out than to say how it should be remedied. We are now told that Earl De Grey, the Secretary for War, is to be appointed head of the fighting Horse Guards and anti-reform policy, and that the gentlemen in uniform who hold the pass so gallantly must be assailed by a champion of higher rank, and of a temper which inclines him to be combative rather than pacific. The Duke of Somerset is known to be of higher rank than Earl De Grey, and it is alleged that he has at least the proper amount of contempt for any person who opposes his views. It may be that his Grace will therefore be able to do away with the office of Field Marshal, their chief. This is, of course, a desirable rearrangement, but it does not meet the other difficulty. Earl De Grey cannot be sent into the Commons as First Lord, and we have Lord Clarence Paget, from everyone likes, but who is only an Under-Secretary, to answer Sir John Pakington, who has been First Lord, touching the expenditure of millions.

But there is another consideration. Relatively regarded, the Ministers in the Commons are good men. But, to judge by appearances, stormy times are coming up. The great calmer of the billows is himself at rest. The special faculty which he possessed is not only not given to the new leader of the Commons, but it is quite even sure that he thinks it a faculty of the highest kind—that gift of being able to throw oil on the waters. Hitherto a good many of his achievements have thrown oil decidedly in another direction. If a storm is coming up, we shall want first-class men on the side of order and the Constitution. Mr. Gladstone said at Glasgow that those who wanted changes should look to the institutions of the country for the means of producing them. The expression may have been studiously vague, but it may have been intended to signify that a majority in Parliament is the only evidence which the Ministry will accept that change is required. There will be difficulty in maintaining a position which, nevertheless, has reason and safety in it. Assume that the Commons represent the country, it is, of course, for them to say what the country requires. But the party of innovation decline to accept this assumption. "We are not prepared to announce that" we have already said that the subject is so great and the interests involved are so enormous, while there can be no need of hurry, that a full inquiry seems the natural and practical course. But there will be a strong effort made to commit the Government to another policy. The great middle class of England, the true depository of national strength, has made no sign. Though the absence of this sign is evidence that the great class of England is not agitated or anxious on the subject, it need not be taken for apathy or obstinacy. The English love justice. But they also know the value of their institutions, and they know that the power of the people is greater than they enjoy; and those who have aught to lose will not consent to any reckless legislation which shall swamp the lawful influence of the great thinking class. They will gladly concede any reasonable claim. It is for those who take the awful responsibility of Government upon them to see that the whole case is fairly submitted to the council of the nation, that unconstitutional influences are excluded, and that a question so important is approached with every safeguard. Now, we want a wise and strong Ministry to effect this; and it is therefore that men look somewhat wistfully at the scant array of Ministerial strength and wisdom in the House of Commons, the arena of the coming frays.

Mr. Daniel Gooch, M.P., has succeeded to the chairmanship of the Great Western Railway Company.

On Monday the National Gallery was opened after the customary vacation. During the recess an additional number of cells (known of the old masters have been placed under glass, and otherwise been submitted to the recently discovered process of cleaning and restoration. The interior of the building has been thoroughly cleaned and repainted.

THE COURT.

THE Queen, with Prince and Princess Louis of Hesse and the junior members of the Royal family, continues at Windsor Castle, in the enjoyment of good health.

On Thursday week her Majesty, accompanied by the Crown Princess of Prussia and Princess Louis of Hesse, visited the Albert Memorial Chapel for the purpose of inspecting the decorations. The Queen afterwards drove out. Princess Helena rode in the Home Park. Princess Louis took a drive. The Crown Prince of Prussia and Prince Louis of Hesse passed the day shooting.

Yesterday week the Queen held a Council, at which her Majesty was pleased to appoint the Right Hon. the Earl of Clarendon to be one of her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State. The Council was held by the Queen's command sworn in accordingly. Subsequently her Majesty, accompanied by the Crown Princess of Prussia and Princess Louis of Hesse, walked and drove in the vicinity of the Royal demesne. Princess Louis took an airing in the carriage. The Crown Prussia and Prince Louis of Hesse went shooting. The Princess of Hohenlohe arrived at Windsor Castle from London, on a visit to her Majesty. Princess Helena, the Crown Prince of Prussia, and Prince Louis of Hesse received the Princess at the railway station and accompanied her to the castle.

On Saturday last the Queen, accompanied by Princess Louisa, walked and drove in the castle grounds. Princess Louisa rode and Princess Helena took a drive. Prince Louis of Hesse, attended by Baron de Schenck, rode out. The Crown Prince and Princess of Prussia left the castle for Sandringham House, on a visit to the Prince and Princess of Wales.

On Sunday the Queen, Prince and Princess Louis of Hesse, Princess Helena, Princess Louisa, Princess Christian, and the Princess of Hohenlohe attended Divine service in the private chapel of the castle. The Very Rev. the Dean of Windsor officiated.

On Monday the Queen, accompanied by Princess Beatrice and Prince Frederick William of Prussia, walked in the castle grounds. Later in the day her Majesty, accompanied by Princess Louisa, Princess Louis of Hesse, Princess Helena, and Princess Louisa, and attended by the Marchioness of Ely, Lord Charles Fitzroy, and Major-General Ponsonby, went to Claremont to visit Queen Marie Amelie. The Royal party drove to Weybridge Windsor station, and proceeded by train, and travelled thence by a special train viâ Twickenham and Kingston to Teddington. There the personal attendants and equipages were in open carriages. The Queen and the Royal family returned to Windsor by the same route, arriving at the castle at five.

On Tuesday the Queen, accompanied by Prince Frederick William and Princess Charlotte of Prussia, walked in the grounds of the castle. Princess Louis of Hesse, attended by the Marchioness of Ely, drove out. Prince Louis of Hesse accompanied the Princess upon horseback. Princess Helena and Princess Louisa, attended by Miss Caroline Farrington, Lady Augusta Stanley, Major-General F. H. Seymour, C.B., and Colonel the Hon. Augustus Liddell, walked out to be present at the unveiling of the statue of the Prince Consort erected at the Royal Albert Memorial Agricultural College at Windsor station of the Great Western Railway, and travelled thence to a state platform by a special train from the Great Western Railway Company. The train left Windsor at ten minutes past ten o'clock, and proceeded to Reading. At the latter station Princess was attended by Major Fitzpatrick, C.B., joined the Princesses and accompanied them on their journey. At Reading was engaged viâ Basingstoke and Winchester to Bishops Waltham, which was two minutes more than ten minutes past twelve. Their Royal Highnesses were received at the station by Mr. Arthur Peel, M.P., the Mayor, Town and Corporation of Southampton, the Rev. Dr. Bradshaw, Mr. Thred, and Mr. D. B. Crichton, and Mr. C. Wyatt Edgell, the architect and builder of the infirmary. The Royal party proceeded in an open carriage and four, escorted by a detachment of Hants yeomanry rifles, to Vernon Hill, the residence of Mr. Arthur Helps, where their Royal Highnesses partook of luncheon. Lord Ashburton afterwards accompanied by Mr. A. Helps, arrived at the infirmary at a quarter past two. A platform was erected by the Royal Agricultural College, and afterwards presented to and graciously received by their Royal Highnesses. A prayer was then offered up by the Right Rev. the Bishop of Winchester, at the conclusion of which the Royal Princesses withdrawn from the front of the statue amid a flourish of trumpets. The statue is the gift of Mr. Frederick Sharpe, of the Royal Agricultural. At the conclusion of the ceremonial, the Princes and Princesses were conducted over the infirmary and the various out-door establishments. Their Royal Highnesses afterwards drove to the old abbey farm, which was tastefully decorated and fitted up as a refreshment room, and in which a concert was given in aid of the funds of the infirmary under the direction of Mr. Sims Reeves, Miss Poole, and Helen Faucit (Mrs. Theodore Martin) afterwards read three scenes from Shakespeare's "Merchant of Venice." After the entertainment their Royal Highnesses drove to the railway station, escorted by the mounted yeomanry, and returned by special train, arriving at the castle shortly after seven o'clock. Throughout the day the Princes and Princesses were greeted with the warmest enthusiasm, which was graciously acknowledged by their Royal Highnesses. At the time of Bishop Waltham was gaily decorated, and the day was observed as a holiday.

On Wednesday the Queen, accompanied by Prince Arthur and Prince Leopold, drove in the private carriages. Princess Louisa, attended by Lady Caroline Barrington, took a drive. Prince Louis of Hesse, attended by Baron de Schenck, rode out. Princess Louisa, Mr. C. D. Phipps, passed the day shooting. The Prince and Princess Louis of Hesse and Princess Helena, attended by Miss Caroline Farrington, Mr. George Chapel. The Rev. E. Tapsfield and the Rev. Lord Wriothesley Russell officiated. After the service their Royal Highnesses visited the Hon. and Rev. the Dean of Windsor and Mrs. and Mrs. Wellesley at the deanery.

The Queen has been pleased to direct letters patent to be passed under the Great Seal constituting and appointing the Right Hon. John Earl of Airlie, K.T., the Right Hon. Sir Edward Ryan, Sir Edward Ruperson Knatchbull-Hugessen, Esq.; Lieutenant-Colonel Sir Charles Ewan White, and Wm. Ayrton, Esq., to be Her Majesty's Commissioners for executing the offices of Treasurer of the Exchequer of Great Britain and Lord High Treasurer thereof.

The Queen has been pleased to express her intention of complying with the request that a bust of the late Prince Consort may be placed in the Industrial Exhibition of the Central Working Men's Club and Institute at Glasgow. The bust was executed by the Crown Princess of Prussia.

Viscount Torrington and Major-General F. Seymour, C.B., have succeeded Lord Alcmoyn and Colonel the Hon. Augustus de Lord and Groom in Waiting to the Queen.

THE PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF WALES.

The Prince and Princess of Wales took leave of the Countess of Derby and left Knowsley Park yesterday (Friday) week. Their Royal Highnesses, accompanied by the Earl and Countess of Stanley, and Viscount Hamilton, and attended by the Hon. Mrs. W. Grey, Lieutenant-General Knollys, Lord Suffield, and Mr. Hayter station. Their Royal Highnesses were received at the station by Mr. Wm. The Right Hon. the Chancellor of the Exchequer arrived in town on Wednesday from Liverpool.

The marriage of Mr. Thomas R. Alward, Assistant Secretary of the United States Legation at London, and son of the late Mr. Nathaniel Alward, of Queen's-road, Bayswater, with Emily W., only daughter of the Hon. George R. Babcock, of Buffalo, New York, took place last week at St. Peter's Church, Eaton-square, by the Rev. Dr. Hawkins, assisted by Evans. The marriage ceremony was performed by the Rev. William Chalmers. A few noticeable persons were present, among others the Right Hon. the British Minister at the Court of St. James's, the Hon. Mrs. Charles Francis Adams, Mr. Motley, the historian, Mr. Bancroft, the American Minister at Berlin, Mr. Morse (Secretary of the United States Legation), and Dr. David Kinchberger, of the United States Navy. The bride and bridegroom left town in the afternoon for Warwickshire.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

The first promenade of the winter season at South Kensington Gardens took place last Saturday. The conservatory and arcades have been considerably improved since the last season.

It appears from an official document lately issued that among the parochial charities of the metropolis is one of £5 per annum for killing the bull before an execution at Newgate.

The annual meeting of the Royal Geographical Society, on Monday next, a paper will be read by Mr. S. W. Baker giving an account of his discovery of the source of the Nile, in Upper Nyanza.

A member of the Stock Exchange has placed at the disposal of the National Life-boat Institution a sum of £400, to enable it to place a life-boat at the mouth of the Humber, to be named the Lord Mayor of London, and to be stationed there, which is becoming unfit for service.

The 201st anniversary festival of the Royal Society for the Scottish Hospital will be celebrated at the Freemasons' Tavern, on St. Andrew's Day, the 30th inst., when the Right Hon. Sir Macleod Wylie, Knight, Secretary, one of her Majesty's Chaplains, will preside.

Dr. Lankester, F.R.S., will lecture, on Monday next, the first of a series of six lectures on "The Chemistry of Coal," as a portion of the Course of Lectures on Physical Science, to be delivered at the Museum of Practical Science at the School of Mines, in Jermyn-street.

The City Police Commissioners have to nominate a clerk, at £1000 per annum; a chief superintendent, at £500; surgeon, at £200; receiver, at £200; and a chief inspector, at £300. The total expense incurred is £47,686. The total expense incurred, including rent of stations, clerks, offices, &c., amounts to £47,686. The names of Wilmot-road, Oxford-villas, Spurstowe-villas, and Victoria-road, Dalston, have been changed to Albion-road. The cab-fare is to be called Greenwood-road. The name of Victoria-road being so common, it has been changed to Albion-road, because the name is to abolish the name of the one at Pimlico, and to call the whole line of thoroughfare from Kingsland-road to Albion-road, Dalston.

On Tuesday the Pneumatic Railway between Holborn-hill and Farringdon-street took place of the mode of conveying the General Post Office with the terminus of the London and North-Western Railway—and the experiment was successful in every respect. The speed attained for the transmission of parcels is about seven minutes. Many distinguished persons assembled to witness the first trip of the pneumatic train.

The annual meeting of the City of London Young Men's Colonial Society was held on Tuesday evening, at the Cannon-street Hotel, Lord Lyveden in the chair. The report stated that the number of members, including those who had joined during the year, was 1,000. The total expense incurred, including rent of stations, clerks, offices, &c., amounts to £47,686. The total expense incurred, including rent of stations, clerks, offices, &c., amounts to £47,686.

The Metropolitan Board of Works held their weekly meeting yesterday week, at which reports in reference to the approaches to the new embankment, and a new street from Islington to the City, were read before them. On the motion of Mr. Tite, it was agreed to consult with the Government as to the means of defraying the cost of those works.

The births of 2055 children—1067 boys and 988 girls—were registered in London last week. In the corresponding weeks of the years 1855-64, the average number, corrected for increase of population, was 1918. The deaths registered in London during the week were 1141. It was the fortieth week of the year, and the average number of deaths for that week in, with corrections for increase of population, 1855-64, was 1076. The exact the estimated number is partly due to the fall of temperature, which was low over the country. The mean temperature of the week commencing with Sunday was 39 in September, and the number is still less as compared with the number of deaths in the week ending Oct. 28, when the mean was 51. The deaths in that week were 1141. In the seventeen weeks ending with Saturday, Oct. 28, the deaths in the last four weeks were 64, 67, 48, and 61. In the forty-first week of the year, 1864, the average number of deaths from diarrhœa was 21, and in the same week in 1865 the deaths were 61. Scarlatina was fatal to 29 cases, and 30 cases to 7. Typhus was fatal to 21 persons; diarrhœa, from phthisis, and accidents by horses or carriages were fatal were registered in the week. The deaths from violence were 30; from privation, 1. The deaths in the United Kingdom last week were 3910; the deaths, 3911. The annual rate per 1000 in London in the week was 21·1; the deaths, 3911. The annual rate per 1000 in Liverpool the births in the week were 291, the deaths 319; in Manchester—births 211, deaths 198; in Salford—births 71, deaths 61; in Birmingham—births 225, deaths 168; in Leeds—births 211, deaths 181; in Bristol—births 104; in Edinburgh—births 226, deaths 214; in Dublin—births 145, deaths 148. The rate of mortality last week was 24 per 1000 in London, 34 in Edinburgh, and 30 in Dublin. The births were 2055 boys, 1067 girls, 988 in Manchester, 211 in Salford, 76 in Birmingham, 72 in Leeds, 22 in Bristol, 20 in Hull, and 31 in Dublin.

LAW AND POLICE.—An important decision was given by the Master of the Rolls yesterday. Lord Henry Spencer, who died at Paris, had left about £70,000 to the "Hospice de Londres." The question was whether the Royal Benevolent Institution was entitled to receive the sum under this designation. He decided that it did not mean hospitals as we know them here, but rather a kind of benevolent institution established within their own limits for persons who were unable to take care of themselves, either from age or infirmity, and who, from their infancy upwards, had been subject to mental incapacity, or by reason of any bodily ailment which was not suitable to be received in the ordinary hospitals, were not able to apply for admission in chambers to be put on the list of institutions which are to participate in the funds bequeathed.

Sometime ago the clerk to a solicitor at the West-End forged a signature to the back of a cheque for £5, and received the cash at the bank of the person whose name he had forged. He was apprehended, and, on a visit for Lisbon. Fortunately, the police found where he had gone to, and, by telegraphing, have him brought back. The prisoner had thought he could escape justice by the value of the money he had has been obtained by the Portuguese police.

The Lord Chief Justice of England and Lord Justice Sir Roundell Horton Eyre, claiming to be Duchess of Lancaster, for a declaration of her Majesty's title thereto. Mr. Serjeant Ballantine, Mr. Edmund Beal, and Mr. Cumberland, to be tried before a special jury.

In the Court of Bankruptcy, on Monday, yesterday week, the applicant, Mr. Reiss, was in what might seem the impossible position of being both plaintiff and defendant. He had, it appeared, bought at an auction which there are now funds to satisfy, and has taken out administration to the effects of the deceased, who, it is said, left him also a residue to be in his therefore plaintiff in the case as representing the original plaintiff by the bankruptcy, and defendant as the representative of the deceased husband.

The Rev. James Kelly, of Liverpool, whose recent litigation against local ratepayers excited much interest, and Mr. Henry Mackenzie, who had obtained from the Court of Queen's Bench a rule for a new trial of the action brought against him by the former for alleged inadequate police force.

An adjudication of bankruptcy has been made against Mr. J. T. Norris, formerly M.P. for Liverpool, and head of the firm of Norris, Sandbach, and other companies, and had the reputation of being a man of large wealth. He was a member, also, for the borough of Penryn. The failure, it appears, was in the large paper manufactories are reliable, but lost his seat at the late general election.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

THE racing season continues "lively." Lord Stamford has recommenced his constitution to withdraw from the turf, and only changes his mind now and then to take up twenty-one stars, sweeps, and yearlings at Tattersalls, on the 20th instant at the Hôtel de Ville of Newmarket. Racos only seem to thrive at Liverpool in the spring and autumn, and this year has been no exception to the rule. The Liverpool Cup was lucky on the first day; Julius, who is now rising nine, cut down her field in the Liverpool Cup, and Mr. Merry, of the Derby of Newmarket, with Mr. Chaplin's names are each attached to four; and Lord Glasgow's Lady Elizabeth, and Mr. Merry's Lord Lyon were sporting colours with seventy subscribers to the Sunning Hill Stakes, and the Prince of Wales's Hermit to the Liverpool Cup.

The Queen racons opened on Monday, with a run of thirty-five minutes and a kill in the open, followed by a run of forty minutes on ground from Thorpe Trussell's almost to Gaston Way. The meet at Kirby Gate was as large as ever; but Lord Wilton and some of the older Meltonians were not out. Mr. Sainsbury is now the owner and their riders went down by a special train on Tuesday, to open the season with a run from Market Harborough. Mr. Sainsbury, it is said, was there to a moment with the hounds; and "Red Rover"—who was bred by Mr. Sainsbury—showed some great thing over the grass last year, and also opened the season with a good hour and a quarter—a wet day and a kill. Mr. Sainsbury's stud groom, Mr. Tom Bailey "saddles" sportsmen "rode and ran the roads, as usual, with amazing energy and success, and was in at the death on the first day's hunting on Monday left, he made a short dodging run of it, and was taken in a yard near Eton. The Queen's hounds met at Windsor on Tuesday, but did not do much.

The calls upon the greyhound kennels for Southport and Broughton reduced the Hedgway entries not a little, as out of 174 entries for the two leading ties, Southport and Broughton, only one can. The North Lancashire Stakes, Mr. Dunlop's Prince Duncan got rid of Caribineer and Wizard, Mr. Lee's Rosebud, and the third ties and the cup, and the blood of Scotland Yet was second for the South Lancashire with Mr. Hewitt's Rosebud, Mr. Hewitt's Sportsman and Feltfare for the Clifton Cup. Lord Sefton's Scapegrace improved very much on Broughton running down and defeating Mr. Hewitt's Parade, winner of the Scottish National in the first ties, she won the South Lancashire Stakes, Mr. Hewitt's Rosebud did not do much.

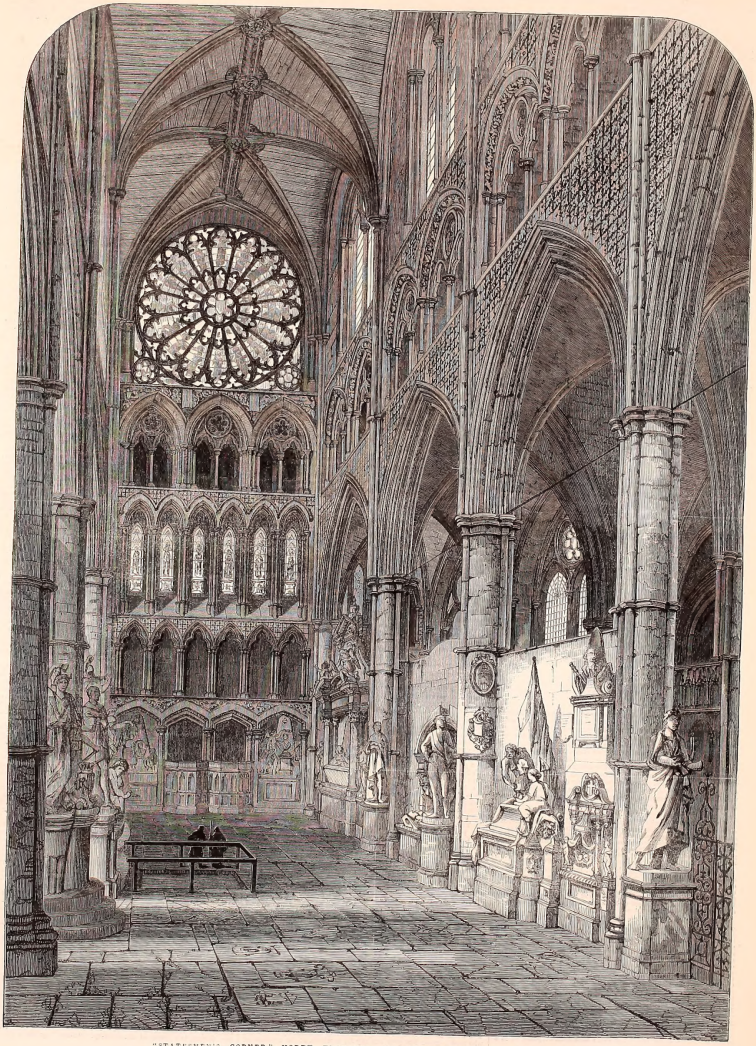
STATESMEN'S CORNER IN WESTMINSTER ABBEY.

THE burial of Lord Palmerston in the north transept of Westminster Abbey, where Pitt, Fox, and Canning are buried, has led to a pretty general expression of the remark, that this part of the venerable church may as well be distinguished henceforth as the "Statesmen's Corner," in proper correspondence with the title of "Poets' Corner," officially attached to that part of the south transept which contains so many monuments of our most famous literary men. The distribution, indeed, of such monuments of either class as are to be found in the Abbey is very far from answering completely to this principle of arrangement; for the statue of Wordsworth sits in the baptistery, not in Poets' Corner; while the Right Hon. William Pitt, with Anarchy chained at his feet, and History painting his portrait on the other side, rises to address the House from a very elevated position over the west door; and his great rival, Charles James Fox, with a couple of female nurses, Liberty and Peace, reclines upon his deathbed, to the consternation of a kneeling negro, somewhere about the same part of the church. The actual graves of Pitt and Fox, as we remember from Sir Walter Scott's touching allusion to the fact, are situated close to each other in the north transept, which is nearly 200 ft. distant from either of the colossal groups of sculpture dedicated to their respective names. The monument, also, of Mr. Spencer Perceval — a prostrate effigy of that unfortunate Minister, mourned by the allegorical figures of Power, Temperance, and Truth — is erected in the north aisle of the nave; and good Mr. Wilberforce, done into marble, with a startling and disagreeable realistic effect like that of wax-work, is seated in his armchair in the north aisle of the choir, far out of sight of the place where his body was actually interred.



On the other hand, both in the north transept, which we shall now call Statesmen's Corner, and in the opposite quarter, styled Poets' Corner, we find much of the space and the most convenient stations occupied by dukes, earls, bishops, admirals, and generals, whom we could wish elsewhere, to make room for the increasing crowd of Englishmen, of political or literary eminence, claiming sepulchral honours. It may be impossible for the Dean and Chapter to entertain any proposal for removing to another part of the Abbey such monuments as were placed, either at the private cost of noble families or by a Parliamentary vote, over the identical spot where persons of distinction were buried a hundred and fifty years ago. But in the case of that huge pile of feeble monstrosities which blocks up the whole of the central arch on that side of the north transept where Palmerston is laid, we should be glad if it might be suggested that as the three young naval officers — Captain Lord Robert Manners, Captain William Bayne, and Captain William Blair — who were killed in Rodney's battles in the West Indies, in 1782, probably received the usual burial of sailors at sea, there is no peculiar reason for keeping their cumbrous memorial in this precise site; and it may, without impropriety, give place hereafter to the tombs of great English statesmen. The Illustration of Lord Palmerston's funeral which we published last week shows the intolerable awkwardness of this misplaced exhibition of inferior though most pretentious statuary art, not only taking up all the space which might be occupied with more truth and propriety by such monuments as those of Pitt and Fox, but entirely destroying the architectural effect of the side aisle, by the piece of blank wall, which was necessary to back up the straggling group of sculptures, filling the beautiful niche in which it stands. The same hapless and stupid outrage upon the sacred building, which its clerical conservators should never have allowed, is to be found with the monument to Lord Chatham in the neighbouring arch, otherwise a fine and expressive work, decreeing Cowper's praise—

> Bacon there
> Gives more than female beauty to a stone,
> And Chatham's eloquence to marble lips.

The first William Pitt, whom some have called the greatest—but they were both alike patriotic and magnificent as well as able and masterly English statesmen—stands, in the attitude of oratory, on a lofty pedestal, supported by the seated figures of Britannia and Fortitude; while Britannia, with Neptune on the one hand and Force on the other, sits firmly enough below. The more refined and radical taste of our own age would, perhaps, reject the introduction of these allegorical figures. But that style of art is more gracefully and vigorously displayed in the composition of Chatham's monument than in the assemblage of odd and unmeaning fancies, the lovely bedding recollections of Flora, Cornucopia, the winged Fame holding a wreath or crown, the Britannia doing nothing at all, the lion holding a shield, the cornucopia, the urn, the scroll, and the heap of nautical instruments and submarine curiosities which litter the tomb-stone of Nelson's grandiloquent hero. The monument, by Flaxman, to Lord Chief Justice Mansfield, occupying the next bay, but not, like the other monuments mentioned up the west and ugly wall, is admirable for the serene dignity of expression in the face and attitude of the ennobled Judge, while the supporting figures—Justice with her scales, and Wisdom with her book—are quite duly and significantly present.

The more ancient monuments of the larger size, conspicuous on the opposite side of the north transept (which is shown to the right hand in the Engraving on page 461), are those of two Dukes of Newcastle. These are, first, William Cavendish, the loyalist Duke, who died in 1676, and who had also been one of the tutors of Prince Margaret, "a wise, witty, and learned Lord, which her many books do testify;" one of that noble family of Lucas and Lisle, whom we have, indeed, noble, "for all the brothers were wise, and all the sisters virtuous." The second is John Holles, Duke of Newcastle, who died in 1711. Three of our old Admirals—namely, Sir Charles Wager, Vernon, of Portobello, and Sir Peter Warren—are likewise accommodated here with sculptures by three different artists—Scheemakers, Rysbrack, and Roubiliac, who have, curiously enough, adopted in each case the same idea—Fame blowing a trumpet to the Admiral; Fame crowning a bust of the second Admiral; and Hercules putting a bust of the third Admiral on a pedestal. The Hercules stands ready to crown it with laurel. The force of artistic invention, it appears, was applied to the Admiral, and not to the English admirals, could no further go. Other monuments of this class, besides two or three of singular interest and beauty, are to be found, in the side aisle of the north transept, which does not come within our present View. There, too, are the busts, by Mr. Westes, of Charles Dibdin and Sir George Rodney, and the latter a most characteristic likeness; and the statue of Francis Horner, by Chantrey; and those of Henry Hastings, by Roubiliac; of Matthew Prior; of Sir Thomas Fowell Buxton; and the statue of Sir William Follet, by Behnes.

There are four single statues—those of Castlereagh, Canning; Sir Robert Peel, Governor of Bombay; and Pitt—in the area of West Poet. There, being simply mounted on pedestals of a convenient size, placed at the side-walls of the arches, contrast favourably with the huge and unmeaning position, with the high-towering, wide-sprawling groups of figures in which the sculptors of a former age seemed to delight. The statue of Castlereagh, by Francis Chantrey, is nearly opposite to the grave of Lord Palmerston, which is indicated by the black hatchment above. Castlereagh, by the accomplished orator, dressed in a classic robe, holds a scroll in his right hand, the left arm resting on a pedestal. His person is described as one of his familiar attitudes: while speaking; at his feet on a pile of books. The countenance is full of calm intelligence and noble feeling; the whole form is animated with the very spirit of the man. Canning is excellent, in its way, in the statue by Gott of Sir John Malcolm, in his uniform as Major-General, with hand resting on a sword. The statue of Sir Robert Peel, by Gibson, stands in the right-hand corner, in the foreground of this View. The gravestone of William Pitt lies in the centre of the pavement of the north transept, where it may be found, with a little search; but the inscription does not remain so legible as might be wished. The grave of Charles James Fox is but a few feet distant—

> Genius, and taste, and talent gave
> For ever temb'd beneath the stone,
> Where—learning lovely learning pride!
> The mighty chiefs step side by side.
> Then upon Fox's grave the muse
> Twill trickle to his rival's bier;
> And Pitt's cold monument bedew,
> And Fox's shall the notes rebound.
> The solemn echo seems to cry,
> Here let their discord with them die;
> Speak not for them a separate doom,
> Whom Fate made brothers in the tomb.
> But search for their memorial in the page
> Of one such word'rous man the dust.

The six lancet-windows of the north transept, painted with figures of Moses, Joshua, Caleb, Gideon, David, and Jonathan, and with medallion portraits of their chief exploits, were presented by the surviving officers of Sir James Outram's army, killed in the Indian War of 1857-58; while another window, in the south aisle, has been presented to that of Brigadier the Hon. Adrian Hope. The rose-window, higher up, is filled with paintings of the Queen and the twelve Apostles, and the four Evangelists, is of much older date; and, compared with the gorgeous window of the south transept, which was put up in 1847, its effect is rather mild. The exquisite beauty of the sculptured details in this part of the Abbey demands the observation of the visitor, to whom his curiosity is satisfied respecting the monuments in Statesmen's Corner.

In Macclesfield Chapel, on Monday, Dr. Manning was enthroned as Roman Catholic Archbishop of Westminster. The ceremony takes a cheerful view of the prospects of his Church in heretical England, as a generation or so ahead, the Anglican faith will be "absorbed in the bosom of the Church of his adoption," in the midst of a world-wide conflict which is going to end in a glorious victory over Pope, Church, and religion, known as the rule ark of salvation moving upon the face of the waters."

The Military and Iron Company launched, on Saturday, an ironclad cupola-frigate, built on Captain Cowper Coles's principles, for the Russian Government. Several distinguished Italians were present at the launch. On the same day the Thames Ironworks Shipbuilding Company launched from their yards on the east-coast figate for the service of the Queen of Spain. The Duke of Montpensier, the Marquis of Molino, Spanish Ambassador, and other distinguished Spanish guests were present.

The coming of age of the Marquis of Blandford was celebrated last week at Blenheim Palace in a manner worthy of the princely house of which the Marquis is the heir. The festivities began on Monday with a dinner to the distinguished gentlemen connected with the estate. On Tuesday the tenantry of the Blenheim estates in Oxfordshire, Buckinghamshire, and Wiltshire were entertained at a dinner in the grand hall of the palace, and at night the entire suite of the state and private rooms were opened for the reception of the wives and families of the tenants, who assembled for a ball in the library, at which the Duchess of Marlborough and the ladies of the family and others visiting the palace were present. On Wednesday the cottage tenants and their wives, and the workmen and their families employed on the estate, were entertained at a magnificent fete champêtre—those connected with Blenheim and the Oxfordshire estates to the number of about 600 in the riding-school of the palace, and those of Buckingham-shire and Wiltshire in their respective localities; and at night there was a display of fireworks. On Thursday there was a meet of the Blenheim hounds at Blenheim. The palace was opened on Friday for the reception of a great county and university gathering. Dancing took place in the library, and the whole suite of rooms was open for conversazione, and supper was served in the hall. The week's entertainments passed off in a highly successful manner.

ECHOES OF THE WEEK.

THE 5th of November, without the Gunpowder Treason Service, Guy Fawkes, fireworks, and bonfires, and the 9th of November without men in armour! Stands England where it did? Is the British Constitution quite safe? Are there no fears abroad for the inviolability of the Charter of William the Conqueror and the Protestant succession? Well, the 5th of November has fallen on a Sunday; and, although one who listed might have read the Gunpowder Treason Service to himself, there is surely no need to make the common service an occurrence to the liturgy, which is simply an insult to our Roman Catholic fellow-subjects. We are apt to grow very spiteful when we hear this foreigner, that foreigner, denounce the Massacre of St. Bartholomew; and that "conversion of England," which Archbishop Manning spoke so hopefully the other day at his entronization in Moorfields Chapel, will not be materially helped but by moderation. It is vital already to the commemoration of a bygone fanatic. A few grey maids their appearance in the streets on Monday the 6th; but the more fantastic and preposterous appearances, much more closely resembling Og, the King of Bashan, and his iron bedstead, which we have from Punch and Hawkes. I now see guy in a hockey-cart, and another in a perambulator. I think the police should look to these conveyances. Their entrepreneurs are in the majority of cases the lowest order of roughs; strangers, who make it their business, remember, and "Hollas, boys, hollas!" is assuredly only a variation of the old and time-honoured tumult.

As for the Lord Mayor in Brass, his disappearance from this year's Lord Mayor's Show may be, if you choose, considered only as temporary; and perhaps it is. Lord Mayor, aldermen, and sheriffs in Venice, in the great King of the City may have a weakness for ancient knights; and the Venetian people have a procession of heroes in the streets on the circus; and the next present us with a locomotive representation of "The Marquis of Conway, or the ransome of Sir Bevois with the great dragon Pembuckagon from "Arthur's Show." And to my mind, the Lord Mayor's Show is the best show in London, and a delight to the guy in gorgeot and greaves the go-by. He was a grand sight, mounted on his prancing charger, but, later in the afternoon of a wet day, with his panoply and footster and trappings all dripping, he looked most painful; and towards night, when the Man in Brass generally makes his appearance, I have seen him standing in the open carriage about his person, so that he was as "tight" within as his armour was loose without. Perhaps the Lord Mayor has a too sensitive temperament it was impossible to contemplate him without forebodings of rheumatic inflammation and discouragement. But the Man in Brass ever fell off his horse. Once down on the ground, it was physically impossible for him to get up again in a hurry.

Some critics have taken exception to the character of Mr. Venus, the anatomical "artist," in Our Mutual Friend, on the score that manufacturers of most delicate and refined productions cannot be generally thoughtful and cultivated persons—"artists," indeed, in the truest sense of the word. I myself am inclined to think Dickens's bent with call-fore for the sisters of "loughsure men." I am acquainted with a collier, a Yorkshire collier, who is a botanist and Mr. Venus is closely drawn from nature, and that his filthy workshop, by the intimate Lowthian Bell, resembles the Venusian den of which I enclose a sketch, for lodger, is a Dutch picture of scrupulous fidelity, of which the original may be found not a hundred miles—as the penny-a-liners say—from Newcastle-on-Tyne. I have seen the same remark made by Mr. Dickens himself, in his preface to Our Mutual Friend—that the strangest things in fiction are often mere copies of fact. This remark is applicable in fiction what are the commonest experiences in life.

The pursuit of good letters has lost a faithful and capable follower in the death of Dr. James Love, a contributor to many reviews, and for long connected with the Field, the Queen, and other weekly newspapers. He was also a contributor to many magazines, and to the reviews and magazines. Educated at the Blue-coat School, where he was contemporary with Coleridge Cunningham, his first experience of business life was in a lawyer's office; but he soon left it for literature, going into literature and journalism, and soon found his place, and steadily kept it, until the day of his death. His acquirements in the field of French tongue his proficiency may be estimated by his very excellent translation of Victor Hugo's "Toilers of the Sea." Of late years that he was frequently consulted by his friend Victor Hugo on matters relating to the English language. His reviewing and Notes and Queries was an omnivorous reader, and was "well posted up" in the literature of the seventeenth century. He had a genuine enjoyment to geology. A writer of clear, nervous English, and the possessor of a style which was all his own, his style was quaint, and Dr. James Love

Bonheur, and a series of Italian sketches, by Mrs. Benham Hay, also specially deserve attention.

The pictures by foreign artists are generally choice in quality, and include many gems of former exhibitions at the French Gallery. The following paintings are particularly well represented:—Messrs. De Penne, Duverger, Gérome, Bougueseau ("The Indigent Family," a noble picture, deserving study by British artists as well as the public), Keller, Troyer, Bronland, the two Knokkoeks, Nordenberg, E. Frère, Chavet, de Fontaine, Verschuur, A. Schmidt, C. Baugniet, Perrou, Seignac, C. Wallandre, H. Schlesinger, A. Bonheur, and J. C. Thom (a young English artist of promise, a pupil of E. Frère).

About three months back, under the heading 'Art in Photography," we reviewed a series of photographs, by Mrs. Cameron, then, as now, on view at Messrs. Colnaghi's, Pall-mall, and which, though disfigured by manipulative blemishes, appeared to us the most artistic capabilities in photography of the highest and most valuable kind. Since that review Mrs. Cameron has produced many large and also many other admirable works. We are glad to add that the whole of her collection is now being exhibited in the rooms the use of which has been lent by Mr. Gambart) above the Winter Exhibition at the French Gallery, Pall-mall. As the exhibition is open to the public, and not public those weeks, we strongly recommend a visit from all interested in a wonderful art—still, perhaps, in its infancy; and we hope to have space next week to notice that portion of the collection which we have not yet reviewed.

The ceremony of uncovering the monument which has been raised by subscription to the late Alderman Livesey, of Rochdale, took place, last Saturday, in the presence of a large number of persons.

The ship Savoir Faire, bound from Liverpool to Calcutta, was wrecked on Tuesday, on the Kentish Knock, off the mouth of the Swin. Weekend and Calnow life-boat of the National Life-boat Institution succeeded in rescuing the crew of twenty-two men.

A company is being formed in Devizes, Wilts, to supply that town with water. A spring, near the village of Roundway, is the source from which the supply will be obtained. It is estimated that the company will be able to sell water at the rate of 6d. per 1000 gallons.

The Fenian prisoners have commenced proceedings against the Lord Lieutenant, Mr. Stronge, the governor of Mountjoy prison, and others, and actions for libel are to be brought against Archbishop Cullen, for his late pastoral. Mr. Gray, proprietor of the Freeman's Journal for publishing the pastoral.

A whole-length testimonial portrait of Mr. H. C. March Phillips, a Deputy-Lieutenant of the county of Devon (executed by Mr. Sydney Hodges), was presented at the Plymouth Guildhall, on Friday last, and a dinner to Mr. Phillipps was afterwards given at the Ball Saloon, at which a large number of the leading and yeomanry gentry were present.

Mr. Miller, M.P. for the Leith Burghs, was entertained at dinner, yesterday week, by 250 of the electors, in the Assembly-rooms, Leith—Lieutenant-Colonel Ramsay, of Whitehouse, in the chair. Mr. Miller, in his reply to the toast, in acknowledgment of his services to the port of Leith, especially referred to his connection with the Leith Docks Bill.

The Shenandoah, one of the Confederate cruisers which has been preying upon American vessels, has arrived in the Mersey, entered the port of Liverpool, on Monday, and surrendered to her Majesty's ship Donegal. It is to be New Year's Day before the Shenandoah will be clear of the Shenandoah asked of the pilot who boarded the vessel was whether there was peace between the North and South, and on being answered in the affirmative he gave up his sword to the Government.

Lieutenant James Henry Lalor, of the 9th Connecticut Volunteer, United States, who was wrecked on landing from the steam-ship Erin (from which arrived at the Cove of Cork on Thursday), was brought before the magistrate on Saturday and discharged. The police, however, have received instructions to watch his movements, as there was no evidence to connect him with Fenianism, and he is about to return, with his uncle, to America.

The Royal Albert Infirmary at Bishop's Waltham, the foundation-stone of which was laid on Wednesday, the 25th ult., was opened on Tuesday, in the presence of their Royal Highnesses Prince Arthur and Princess Louise of Wales, and a large number of the nobility and gentry of the county, rendered by Thomas Chamberlain, Esq., of Hursley, who presided at the same time. We shall illustrate the opening of the Infirmary in our next Number.

A piece of plate, value £50 guineas, was presented, on Thursday, to the Queen of Liverpool, Mr. Edward Lawson, who has filled the office of Lord Mayor of that town for two years—although not literally ordered to the present ceremony—"as a mark of the high sense of the manner he made fathers more happy over offs malcontiles, torn tal tea gifties bye yo tommunion ove ane silver cradle on the occasion of the christening of a silver vase was presented to the Mayoress of Rochdale, Mrs. Tatham, by the members of the Co-operative "as a memorial of the happy incident during the mayoralty of her husband."

The Industrial Exhibition was finally closed last Saturday evening. Wednesday was originally fixed as the last day, but it was deemed advisable to continue the exhibition for another week, and to devote the receipts of the extra days to the fund being raised in Bristol for the erection of a free hospital. The announcement was received on Wednesday week at a meeting at which the Mayor (Mr. W. Nash) presided, and at which Mr. H. Bolwell, Mr. Bolwell, Mr. Proctor, Alderman Proctor, Mr. H. E. Allen read the report of the committee, from which it appeared that the total number of exhibitors was 1,600. The total number of visitors during the six weeks the exhibition was open was 156,926, and the total receipts were £2,624. After the amounts, a sum of £1,000 had been set aside for refunding calculations to be distributed in prizes, but the prizes awarded only absorbed £500, and the committee had decided to hand over the £500 remaining to the building's work, however, it was stated, that there was not quite so valuable the balance of the £500 and a further sum of £150 to be given in additional prizes. After the discharging all liabilities there will remain a considerable surplus, which it is proposed to divide among the principal medical charities and some of the other institutions of the city.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

Rarely all National Securities have been in improved request, and prices have shown more animation than during the week now terminated. The Bank of England stock have been sold with a moderate trade. The continental operations on account of the Bank have been on a fair scale, and some inducement upon the market generally. In the Unfunded debt, very little has been done.

There is a full average supply of money at the Stock Exchange, and the demand for short-notice broking been steady, but rates have been confined to a low range. The following are the rates which have taken place to the end of the week:—

Thirty days' bills	...	...	5 per cent.	Four months'	...	...	6 per cent.
Two months'	...	...	6	Six months'	...	...	6
Three months'	...	...	6

In the Stock Exchange loans for short periods were effected at 6 to 5½ per cent.

The following are the quotations for money taken place to the end of the week:—

	Bank rate.	Open market.		Bank rate	Open market.

WESTMINSTER HOSPITAL, opposite Westminster Abbey.—The hospital is entirely dependent on the voluntary contributions of the public and is urgently in need of increased benefactions. The annual expenditure exceeds by nearly £800, the income from all sources, and the debt has increased to £1,600, since the opening of the new wards. The Committee have been compelled to limit and henceforth refuse the PRIVILEGE OF HEAD OF PATIENTS, which has been enjoyed by the governors for the last quarter of each year. The out-patient department has increased in the rate of 2,000 a year, and the expenditure for objects entirely of charity has increased 50 per cent in proportion. Donations to and out patients were received in 1864, and out of that number 1,000 were admitted into the wards, and 1,000 were relieved at the doors of the hospital.
Donations and Subscriptions will be thankfully received by the Treasurer, Sir Benjamin Hall, Bart., M.P., Westminster Palace; and by C. Steward Reed, Esq., or by the Secretary, at the Westminster Hospital, opposite Westminster Abbey.—F. J. WILSON, Secretary.

FORBES'S DRAWING-ROOM PIANOFORTE COMPOSITIONS.

The "Choir" Quadrilles, on favourite Airs from the collection of popular Hymn and Psalm Tunes, by Dr. Gauntlett. Forbes holds a metaphysician place, and deservedly so, for his quadrilles are unsurpassed for elegance of melody, and tasteful style of manner and pianoforte writing. He has the faculty of adorning his melodies, whether original or borrowed, with such graceful and appropriate ornaments as to render them irresistible.—Era. Forbes's quadrilles invariably have the merit of mainly running through them in the most masterly fashion, and of being extremely effective.—Orchestra. Forbes's polkas always succeed.—Queen's Concert Rooms Journal.

PRESENTATION OF THE FREEDOM OF THE CITY OF GLASGOW TO MR. GLADSTONE.

THERE speeches made by Mr. Gladstone on Wednesday week at Glasgow—the first, in reply to an address from the Reform Union, in the Trades' Hall; the second, an hour or two later, in the City Hall, upon his receiving the freedom of the city, presented to him by the Lord Provost on behalf of the Corporation; and, lastly, the third, at a great meeting of working men, held the same evening in the Scots Hall—have doubtless been perused by very many of our readers with the attention which is due to all that may be said at the present juncture by the most important member of the new Ministry. We give on page 457 an illustration of the scene in the City Hall, where the ceremony of investing him with the freedom of Glasgow took place. The hall was, of course, filled with spectators in every part, while Mrs. Gladstone, the Misses Gladstone, Lady Blantyre, and the Ministers of Glasgow occupied the platform behind. On the platform were the magistrates and members of the Town Council; Mr. Dalgleish, M.P.; Mr. Graham, M.P.; Sir E. Colebrooke; Mr. Crum Ewing, M.P.; Mr. Mure, M.P.; Captain Orr Ewing, M.P.; the Dean of Faculty, and other persons of note. At two o'clock Mr. Gladstone, accompanied by the Lord Provost, appeared on the platform, and was received with loud and continuous cheering. The Lord Provost, in presenting the freedom of the city to the right hon. gentleman, referred to the distinguished services which Mr. Gladstone had rendered to the country, and the important changes which he had effected in our financial system for the relief of our home trade and manufactures. An address having been read by the Town Clerk, the freedom of the city, inclosed in a massive gold box (the shape and decoration of which of this box may be seen in the annexed illustration), was presented by the Lord Provost to the right hon. gentleman, who, on receiving it, warmly shook hands with the chief magistrate, and then turned to address the meeting, by whom he was received with loud and long continued cheering. The audience rose to greet him, and for some moments there was a complete ovation, the ladies in the gallery waving their handkerchiefs, and the gentlemen their hats. Silence having at length been restored, Mr. Gladstone delivered his speech.

He began by saying that even at that moment, and amidst the flattering applause of his fellow-citizens, a man, he felt himself most solitary in his public life—so many of his former colleagues and political associates had for years been removed from his side. He named, besides Lord Palmerston, Mr. Cobden, Lord Herbert, the Duke of Newcastle, Sir George Cornewall Lewis, Mr. Sidney Herbert, Lord Canning, and Lord Dalhousie, all able and experienced statesmen, who were strong enough to have formed a Cabinet by themselves. He referred, also, to the death of the late Prince Consort, whose loss could never be replaced. He believed, however, that this country would never want a competent succession of useful public men, to carry on the administration of its affairs. The name of Earl Russell, as chief of the new Ministry, was itself a pledge and promise to the people. "A man," said Mr. Gladstone, "who has fought for British liberty, for our institutions and for our laws, but with a view to the strengthening of those laws; who has fought on a hundred fields in their improvement; and who, long ago, when he had scarcely-third honourable year, to unlearn the lesson of his whole life, to change the direction of his course, and to forfeit the inheritance which he has secured in the hearts and memories of his countrymen. I therefore come to think that the country has reasonable assurance in the name of the person who has for the second time assumed the responsibility of guiding the destinies of the Crown, with the aid of many experienced and distinguished persons whom I am happy to call my colleagues,—I therefore hope that the country has reasonable assurance that the same wise and enlightened spirit which has for the last thirty or thirty-five years distinguished in the main the policy of British legislation and the conduct of the Executive Government will still continue to be exhibited by those who will have the responsibility and direction of public affairs." The right hon. gentleman then turned to a retrospect of the chief measures, political and social reforms, which have been accomplished within that time. We have seen," he remarked, "the popular franchise wisely and temperately, yet boldly, enlarged; we have seen the education of the people immensely extended, with at the same time, all due regard to the sanctity and the spirit of religion on the one hand, and to the feelings of private conscience on the other; we have seen religious disabilities, for the most part, swept away; we have seen many interesting and deeply important questions of social policy asserting from year to year greater and still greater importance; we have seen the principle of free trade and the method by which taxes are taken from the people largely reconsidered and revised; and we have seen all these great changes made with a view to the promotion of one great end—the freedom of the industrious not only among the various members of our own community, but also among the various members of the great human family, the nations of the world." And, for the reform which he thought had been the most fertile of good results was the adoption of the principle of free trade. He enlarged briefly upon this topic, expressing his conviction of the effect of a sound commercial policy in removing the most frequent causes of war, particularly with regard to the colonial trade. He observed that, while these principles acted more immediately to encourage the material prosperity of mankind, those who were most zealous for their progress should not be accused of adopting the worship of mammon, since there were high moral benefits connected with the peaceful and friendly intercourse of nations, carried on by those pursuits of industry and commerce which were meant primarily for the satisfaction of our lower wants. He felt convinced that these ideas were now firmly rooted in the minds of the people of Great Britain; and her Majesty's Ministers, he added in an ardious task, would rely on the support of the country. "We have," he said at the ending, "to the best of our ability, we have much, indeed, to acknowledge with thankfulness; and, most of all, we have to delight in the recollection that the politics of this world are perhaps very slowly, with many intervals, many checks, many reverses, nevertheless, upon the whole, gradually assuming a character which promises to be less and less one of conflict and violence; less and less one of violence and bloodshed; more and more one of general kindness and friendliness; and more one connecting the common reciprocal advantages and the common interests pervading the world, and uniting together the whole of the human family in a manner which befits rational and immortal beings, owing their existence to one Creator, and having but one hope either for this world or the next."

Mr. Gladstone resumed his seat amid great cheering. He subsequently visited the Exchange, where he was presented to a number of by an immense throng within and without the walls of the building.

THE ABBEY CHURCH OF ROMSEY, HAMPSHIRE.

THE small town of Romsey, seven or eight miles from Southampton, has lately been noticed for having Lord Palmerston's house of Broadlands in its vicinity, as described in this Journal a fortnight ago. The Abbey Church, of which we give two illustrations on page 466, is one of the most interesting monuments of Norman ecclesiastical architecture belonging to the conventual class of buildings which remain in this country; though a portion of the nave must be referred to a later style. Externally, the west front is distinguished by its bold and massive buttresses, with pilasters rising nearly the full height of the building, and forming the imposts of blank arches in the clear and transept ranges. The whole edifice, it will be remarked, is cruciform, with the central tower at the intersection. The interior has a grand and noble aspect, but presents some striking peculiarities; the choir being unusually short, extending back only a few feet; and each transept being terminated by a circular apse. The triforium, comprising a large round arch, with two arches beneath, has a light and graceful effect. Behind the altar, at the east end, are two windows, with a pair between them, which forms an external buttress, an arrangement which is seldom found elsewhere. The details of ornamental sculpture in the interior are beautifully executed, and the Roman arches of the lantern-tower are likewise worthy of remark. Our illustration on page 466 does not, however, show much more than the part usually occupied for Divine service by the clergy and congregation, amongst whom Lord Palmerston was accustomed, during the days of his residence at Romsey, to take place with exemplary regularity every Sunday morning. The pew which he occupied may be distinguished in the Engraving by the curtains hanging round it. The tombs of Lord Palmerston's father and mother, as well as that of Sir William Temple, his brother, and those of other members of his family are in the south aisle. We have engraved a drawing of the mural tablet, by Flaxman, which was erected by the late Minister to the memory of his parents, about the time when he entered public life. The inscription, which was probably composed by himself, runs as follows:—

Sacred to the Memory of Henry Viscount Palmerston, Baron Temple, and of Mary Viscountess Palmerston, his second wife,
whose remains are deposited near this place.
He was born the 4th Dec., 1739;
Succeeded his grandfather, Viscount Palmerston, on the 18th June, 1757, and departed this life the 20th Jan., 1805.
They left to survive them, by a marriage between them and two daughters, Frances and Elizabeth, to whom they were fond and affectionate parents.

To those who knew the tenor of their days
Verses need but little to express their praise;
To those by whom their virtues were unknown,
For cold applause the pictures would be drawn;
And proud affection asks not for their bier
The casual tribute of a stranger's tear.
With aching bosoms and with bleeding hearts
We marked those signs with which the spirit parts;
Yet bowed submissive to the chastening rod,
For dear bought to ourselves the decrees of God.
More blest to live, they die in Him who trust;
He deals His mercies when he calls the just.

LORD PALMERSTON IN PARLIAMENT.

AN English statesman, to be complete in his function, must be possessed of a dual quality—he must not only be an administrator and a politician, but, more or less, an adept in the art of governing men as the ruling paragon in a representative assembly like our House of Commons. It was the happy fortune of Lord Palmerston to have acquired both these qualifications in no ordinary degree; and though he served at the commencement of his Parliamentary powers by slow degrees, and wielded them with success chiefly during the existence of his second Government, he brought them to a social very near perfection. It is now well known that for many of the long years in which he sat in Parliament—beginning with his election for Newport, Isle of Wight, in 1807—he devoted himself, if not entirely, yet mainly, to the duties of the offices which he held, and rarely opened his lips in the house, except to answer a question relating to the offices which he had under his immediate control, or to propose the Army Estimates as Secretary for War. Although he was the youngest representative of the War Department in the house, the Marquis of Hartington, he commenced his official life as a Civil Lord of the Admiralty, and then in a brief space of time passed to the War Office, there is no record of his having made any attempt to illustrate his short connection with the administration of the Navy by any speech. There is a faint record which goes to indicate that his first essay was on the subject of the slave trade; and, if so, it is a curious indication of early-formed sentiments on a question with regard to which, all through his career and up to the very latest instance of its being mooted, he has held the most decided and uniform language. To those who, in the several Parliaments which have run their course since 1802, have been witnesses of the self-possession, or rather the self-assertion, of Lord Palmerston, in his intercourse communications with the House, it must be something surprising to learn that for twenty years before that he was characterised as modest and retiring; was in vain urged by his colleagues to put forth those powers of debate on general questions which they believed him to possess; and was so reserved on every subject except that of his own department as to have acquired, in those rather jocular and nicknaming Parliamentary days, the sobriquet of the "Silent Friend." The first speech, properly so called, which he was induced to deliver in those early days of gravity—for he was grave almost from infancy in his demeanour in the house in those days, so much so as to elicit from his friend George the remark that he looked as if he had topped needlicity—was on a subject connected with the War Department—namely, the Copenhagen, the policy of which he defended in language good and terse and with argument clear and forcible; but, as the tradition goes, without any deviation from his then characteristic modesty, except as much confidence as was founded on official knowledge. It was on this point that, even at that period, he excelled. He had a most admirably regulated and organised the department over which he presided, was so thorough a devotee of order and method, and had so mastered every detail and complication of his office, that, so far as that was concerned, he was a speaking fact when-ever he had to deal with anything relating to it in the house. This special knowledge and its careful arrangement in his mind stood him in good service when the time came for him to enter into a controversy with the father of financial reform, the late Joseph Hume, on the War Office estimates within the purview of the sweeping indictment against Governmental extravagance and maladministration which Mr. Hume brought forward with an industry and a persistency soon after he entered Parliament. It was, of course, the duty of Lord Palmerston to reply to the enthusiastic financier, and this he did slowly and with the weight derived from the manifest circumstance that he knew well what he was talking about; and soon, with that tone of good-humoured though sharp reproof which he had hitherto kept dormant, it is recorded that he puzzled, perplexed, and quieted Mr. Hume, beginning that series of antithetical phrases which passed to apothegms, and which gave the characteristic to the Parliamentary talk until the very last. One of those phrases which he used in order to satisfy the unconvinced mind of Mr. Hume on some argument with regard to the expenses of the War Office which seemed little short of miraculous has come down to us; for it is said that, adopting again and once more the slave trade as his subjects he spoke with his characteristic good sense, showing what he knew of the subject, delivering himself in clear, but appropriate language, though he could not be called fluent, for he always and in his best days halted in his speech with hesitation even exactly slowly, but with pauses between his words which prevented his ever being forcible; and it was said of him when he was in office that he never took the trouble to choose the most striking and pointed words that were at once the simplest and the most calculated to convey his meaning, and which, indeed, he stated here that these were the characteristics of his speaking to the last. He never rose to the height of oratory, but he was constantly epigrammatic in his style, and this he intended to be in the first regiment, it was indicated as much by the tone of voice and the impressiveness of delivery as by the language in which it was couched, which was rarely, if ever, tinged with imagery or rounded elaborately into periods. Such was the style of Lord Palmerston's mainly of a stiff movement of the arms from the elbow down, while his body was rarely moved, and forward on his heels, which latter were now and then placed together and his figure drawn up in the attitude of deference of the old school. Quarter when he was about to make a most courier-like bow. But the bow, even, and the whole subject-matter of his speeches, then, as has been said, stiff and even ungainly.

It was while out of office, and up time when he receded from the Government of the Duke of Wellington with Mr. Huskisson, and when he had thrown in his fortunes with those of Mr. Canning, that Lord Palmerston's display of his knowledge and his close attention to foreign policy; and he made two speeches then—one on foreign policy generally, and one on the affairs of Portugal—in which he laid down the principles on which he ever afterwards acted, and which, no doubt, laid the foundation of his claims to the seals of the Foreign Office in the Government of Earl Grey. During the years—and, as Ministries have gone since the time of Lord Liverpool, they were not few—in which Lord Palmerston was Foreign Minister, he retained the character in Parliament which he had established at the outset by his powers of speech chiefly, if not altogether, to his own department. Up to 1845, so little part in party discussions had Lord Palmerston taken, that on the prorogation or close of the Session of that year, it was with surprise that not almost only House of Lords and House of Commons was moved to be an imitation of those summaries of the Session which Lord Palmerston had been accustomed to inflict on the Whig Government when they were running to seed under Lord Melbourne. It was this time Sir Robert Peel was Premier, in the full flush of consciousness of leading a strong Government with a strong party at his back; and as Lord John Russell and all the other leaders of the Opposition had departed, Lord Palmerston as Lord Palmerston was sitting almost solitary in the centre of the first Opposition bench, it was clear that this epitome of what was an idea of his own, to which the opportunity tempted him. It was well done, with all the point and vigour for which he was in after years become notorious in the house, but it was received by the House with a surprise which was almost a stare at what seemed very like presumption on his part. Strange as this may seem now, it was nevertheless the fact, and the evidence of its existence is to be found in the circumstance that when Lord Palmerston concluded, it was not the Prime Minister who first moved to reply to him, but Lord Stanley (the present Earl of Derby), then Secretary for the Colonies, who did so. Lord Palmerston calmly leaned back, as Lord Stanley, touched his ear, whispered a word in his ear, and then, rising, delivered a speech, distinguished by all contemporaries, which was quite as wonder how so comparatively unimportant a personage as Lord Palmerston should have taken on himself to make so serious a display of Parliamentary power; and, twitting him all through, Sir Robert turned a general laugh upon him by designating him as "the last rose of summer left blooming alone" on the Opposition benches. Odd as it may seem at present, it is undoubted that on that occasion the discomfiture of Lord Palmerston was complete. After that great oration which he delivered from the close of one day to the dawn of the next on the Greek question, and which no one ventured or desired to follow, so that he had the whole debate of the night to himself, Sir Robert Peel may be said to have compromised Lord Palmerston when he stated that he, in common with the whole country, was proud of the speech and of the man who delivered it. That speech was the great epoch in the Parliamentary life of Lord Palmerston. Henceforth he stood foremost in the rank of great debaters, as from that day he dated the influence on the House, which culminated in his thorough mastery of that assembly, as far as what may be called the rights and privileges of its leader were concerned.

GOLD BOX, IN WHICH THE FREEDOM OF THE CITY OF GLASGOW WAS PRESENTED TO MR. GLADSTONE.

It was while he was Home Secretary in the Government of Lord Aberdeen that Lord Palmerston became specially noted for sharp, not to say flippant, replies to questions put to him, and which were more quick retorts than answers, though sometimes they rose to the height of repartee. Subsequently, and when he was under the influence of the responsibility of Prime Minister, he modified his style of answer; and, while he used it often with great skill to parry or postpone an interrogation which was not convenient to him at the moment, the jest, which was almost a gibe, was divested of its bitterness. The good-humoured tone, the smile on the lip, and the twinkle of the eye; and he seldom failed to raise a laugh against the questioner. This, however, was only true only of the period of his last Administration: for in that between 1850 and 1858 his denouncers in the House of Commons such as myself could tell of the supplementary defects which ended in his resignation. Having come into office almost with the acclamation of the entire parliamentary body, the exception of Sir George Lewis, who had not yet made the impression on the House to which was afterwards entitled by the great experience of his qualities—by a set of colleagues of the calibre of second-rate Under Secretaries, Lord Palmerston found himself unable, as to a great extent, he grew giddy, and treated Parliament with an insolence which was sometimes not a mere affectation of manner, but which arose from almost personal feeling against him and not the least amongst the Liberal members, towards whom his bearing was the most lordly and overbearing of all. On one occasion, when Mr. Bright had been speaking, as he sometimes does speak, rather in preaching tone, Lord Palmerston, in reply, said, "I have called him the "honourable and reverend gentleman," at which there was more of delicate satisfaction than of fun in the bidding of the House. In the last Parliament, however, he had trained himself thoroughly, and exercised (we will not say occasionally) a power of drilling; that tact which for so long a time enabled him to manage a shifty and uncertain body of nominal supporters, was felt by them to be exercised at critical moments; to patch up his small majority, at one time reduced to nineteen votes, and at one time to nine, by bringing waverers of the Opposition to himself when a perilous vote was impending; to find the opportune and anxious vote which would give him victory; to frame amendments and motions with which to meet in a wearing down to turn the enemy's flank at the most critical moment when it was bearing down in irresistible force in front; to accept motions which were not to his taste, as if he were the most delighted lidding only of the House and not of the proposers, and rendering himself a conservative conviction—and to the Conservatives, as conservatives in every individual, that personally no one ever spoke of him without a compliment and a deference which would have felt to be cant, and which politically gave him the first place in the administration of the affairs of the country for his life, of which he was proud. What is ever may be the opinion of his character as a statesman and as a politician, no one can look on his career as a whole, and especially on the life without admitting that at that period he had become one of the greatest, and perhaps the greatest, member of Parliament that ever existed.

LORD PALMERSTON AS FARMER AND LANDLORD.

It has been objected that we desire to know too much about our great men; that we love to pry into their private life, to be told what sort of lads they were, when they got up in the morning, what they breakfasted upon; in fact, that we are meakingly fond of looking at their domestic slippers or catching their wives in curl-papers before we stoop to the keyhole for the purpose. That such a propensity exists, to some extent, we do not deny; but we think that it is not unreasonable know more of the private habits of the world with which we map up the reveals to it; evident from the avidity with which the public has seized "Memoirs of their Own Time" and "Diaries," &c., written by contemporary wits, and friends of distinguished statesmen, in the confidence which awaits the announcement of that "party" known to most families whose friend is about to publish his or her diary, or secretary, and who is therefore on coward with all the sayings and doings of his Court. That propensity, however, requires for its admission of its existence. It does not arise entirely from a vulgar curiosity, but partly has its foundation in a desire to be able to ascertain how far truth and consistency form the basis of the characters we admire or detest; how far the picture of public life is a fitting representative and express image of the inner life. Some specimens of human nature are to be found in every family. The idiosyncrasies mingle around the home; and when the public life is drama is concluded the advocate of liberty, the representative of virtue or party retire behind the scenes, and appear in practice the principles they have upheld in the senate, the bar, or the pulpit. The indiscreet train them better than the indifferent, and we prefer to approach them the less we like them.

Although the common interest is generally true that no man is heroic in the eyes of his own valet, it is, happily, not so in all cases. We are not required to fall back upon such a theory as Carlyle's to establish the possibility of a happy concurrence between the public and private life. The pages of modern history are illustrated by examples, and within the past week another—a truly English specimen—has been added to them in the life and character of Lord Palmerston. It is not the purpose of the present writer with this introductory remark to introduce the reader to the history of Lord Palmerston, or the parlour of his late Premier. His only object is to exhibit him in some of his relations with the tenantry and peasantry of his estates. It is well-known that a high-spirited gentleman considers that the offices of State does not smack money from them, but that, at the close of a long Ministerial career, he may retire to his property, and, in the country, not merely in sentiment, but in fact, very largely his debtor. Lord Clive declared acknowledged, in a famous speech in the House of Commons, that he never was in debt until he became Premier; and, except the order of the Garter and the Governorship of Fort William to which Lord Palmerston gave his whole talent and energy with unflinching devotion, we know of no office that he ever held that did not redound to his profit of fifty years. This being the case, it became needless service of the Premier, under the circumstances, to discover that many that he should husband the resources of his estate with the same care he did with great care. As a landlord his example is worth observation. While absorbed in the affairs of state, he has found time to find out the world with—say, a large share of his attention to the subject matter of improvements affecting stock, tillage, farm-buildings, drainage, labourers' cottages, &c. During the last session in London ship has been expending, in drainage and farm-buildings, some £4000 or £5000 a year on the Romney Marsh estate. His special attention has been given to the drainage of the valley of the Test, so far as his estate goes, which extends from Romsey to Redbridge, and to the land formerly, owing to the unmanageable character of the water courses, of little value; but, under proper management, capable of the finest of the soil, under the influence of the Premier's attention to it has become workable and productive. The position of the land is adjacent to the river Test, and consequently has been peculiarly favourable for irrigation. Until lately the tenants, with the concurrence of their landlord, had practised irrigation to a limited extent; but, generally, however, a change appears to have come over Lord Palmerston's mind with respect to their value; and at a time when so much is being said and written upon the subject it is not important to observe this change in the mind of one who was no novice in practical agriculture, and who knew that, as well as economical grounds, we do not know; but we know that it has only been with the greatest possible reluctance that he has ever called on his tenants to retain an acre of water-meadow. Properly-drained meadows were much more highly valued by him than irrigated meadows were much more highly valued by him than irrigated meadows, and so fondly did he hold to his view of the question, that nowhere, and so fondly did he hold to his view of the question, that neither tenant, agent, nor engineer could alter his determination to get rid of them. Although, out of good feeling to his tenantry, he has left a small proportion of the valley in water-meadow, he has done so with regret; and this may have been purely for sanitary considerations, since he was frequently known to exclaim about the difference he experienced in the temperature after the meadows surrounding his mansion had been laid dry. He tersely expressed the nature of the change by saying that it made the difference of a top-coat less to him. This should be borne in mind by those who are anxious to deluge our already water-logged and agre-steamed valleys, particularly that of the Thames, with the fluid sewage of the towns to the extent of thousands of tons on each station.

Lord Palmerston was as conversant with outfalls and levels as he was with stuccatoff; and while putting kings and queens, viziers and viceroys, to school in State policy, he was ever at liberty for a chat on rural affairs. The following letter, which was written on the very day the answer arrived from the Government at Washington concerning the Trent affair, affords a lively proof of his versatility in this respect:—

> My dear Sir,—I have received your letter of to-day. The question to which it relates seems to me to be one not so simple as to admit of being made to demonstrate that under-draining must render more dry the surface of the ground than open-draining. Water will run off the surface more quickly, it is all, through the channels of open-drains than through the pores of the soil. Undrained land is like a sponge: it is saturated with the moisture which, by capillary attraction, rises always up from the soil to the surface, which in certain conditions, such as sea-fogs, it imbibes from the atmosphere, and with the water which falls from the clouds in rain or snow. The moisture that rises by this spongy upper stratum of the land is got rid of mainly by evaporation into the atmosphere in warm and dry weather. The land is saturated to that point with which that atmosphere is then charged in, in some cases, very considerable, in others very small degree. Water runs off the surface of land which is tilled in the shape of ridges and furrows, to the detriment of the land, and the loss of the crop, if the ridges are not of the proper depth and the furrows sufficiently open, of 6 in. or 9 in. of the surface soil, by the water which lies in the open furrows to that of dry earth. That thickness of crust no longer drives off water, but it is still absorbed and evaporated by the capillary action of the land through which the river flows—that water, instead of being drawn into the atmosphere, is carried off by the river. Land which is tilled in the shape of ridges and furrows, but has deep furrows, does not drain nearly so much as land which is tilled flat, but has shallow furrows, and flat land is not drained so much by open-drains as by under-drains. The good effects of draining, then, upon the atmosphere of the district drained are to increase the moisture of the atmosphere, and to do so to a very large extent of land, which latter has been very much drained of late years. The effects of draining upon the moisture of the atmosphere are different in the different seasons of the year. In the spring and autumn, when Romney to less rather more below it, is most striking and satisfactory, and the improvement in the temperature of the air by draining is perceptible within three limits. But then, as to the effect of under-drainage upon the supply of water to springs and rivers. Rivers are supplied in two ways—from water let into them and by water which rises from springs in their beds as they flow along. Under-drainage, probably, by increasing the depth of the surface soil through which they will be made the outfalls for the drainage of land on higher elevations, may, in some cases, increase the supply of water to springs in the bed of the land through which the river flows—that water, instead of being drawn into the river at the surface, may be carried down to the bed of the river and into the river at the bed. But, on the other hand, under-drainage, by carrying off the water in the surface soil, and, supposing the depth of the drain to be 3 ft. or 4 ft., the water in the subsoil to a considerable depth, the water may be discharged into the river at no very great distance from the beginning of the drainage, and so the river may be drained of water which is in the beds of rivers, the only water that is withdrawn from them is that which percolates through the soil from the river. But I am not aware that any engineer lands; and I have already shown that, as regards each water, the river is in no danger of being drained of water to the extent of more than 3 in. or 4 in. from the upper surface of the land will, as before, find no water to percolate through it to the river. Upon the whole, I am of opinion that, from the causes that I have stated, the effect of draining, on the whole, is to increase the supply of water to springs and rivers. That this is the opinion of engineers I can assert by experience, for the volume of the water that is let into the mill-ponds on my estate is largely increased by drains in adjoining lands. It has so happened that the river has been much fuller at Romsey since the land has been drained than it had been for several years before; but that was owing to causes quite unconnected with the drainage-works.
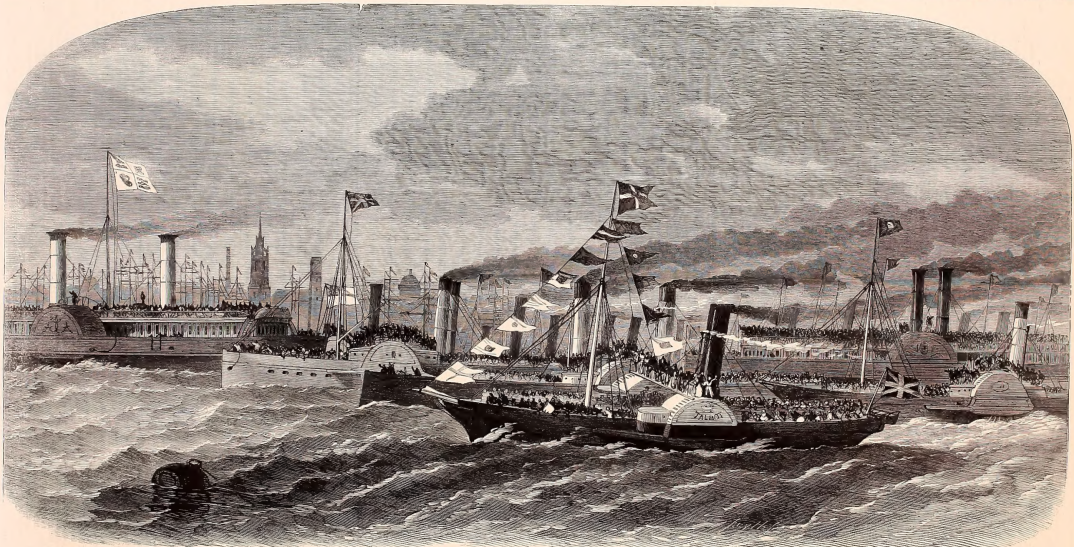
> B. Disraeli, Esq.

It is easily to be believed that the writer of such a letter as this would be perfectly able to quote abstruse calculations as to the distance and proportion of water in the soil, and the consequences of its evaporation, and to apply them to the practical purposes of drainage. It was no uncommon circumstance to find him resorted to by practical men for his opinion on such matters. Mr. Cubitt, the eminent builder, on one occasion being waited upon by an engineer and asked to account for the failure of a drainage scheme, in the style of a parliamentary witness, he turned upon his querist with the inquiry Charles I made of the Royal Society when a certain question was put to him, "I pray, Sir, "what do you come to me for? I do not deny the premises on which the particular question was based, the anecdote of Charles formed a happy illustration of the manner of Lord Palmerston.

His Lordship's interest in the labourers upon and around his estates was unbounded. He was personally a Liberal, and a friend to happiness and prosperity, and was as ready to encourage virtue as to condemn vice. He was a great promoter of cottage flower shows, considering of a good house must be at the foundation of domestic morality and thrift. He encouraged, by the distribution of prizes, the laying up of money, substantial dwellings, affording sufficient and decent accommodation to the occupants and their families, but he showed more interest in improving and enlarging existing cottages, on the ground that the money thus expended would not be laid out in the beer-shop and other agricultural meetings. His own words on this subject are as follows:—"I am also desirous to see the labourer building his own cows." When he said this he added, "The effect of improving "these dwellings will be to increase the value of land." He was perfectly right. Nothing can be more gratifying on the fallacies of a man's wife, and on the other hand, nothing can be more disheartening to the wife than the temper of the human mind which is denominated recklessness. When the husband comes home at the end of a long day's work, and finds up in such a remarkable state that it is impossible for the wife to keep it clean, she becomes disheartened, and ceases to try. The man is disgusted, and flies to the beershop." So much importance did he attach to the cottage accommodation that he always insisted upon a good supply of water for the purpose, for carrying out the cleanliness mentioned. Bed-room accommodation, good drainage, and good ventilation were also primary objects with him. He was not one who referred the placing of pigs for the clothes, and the cuisines for the housewife, did not accept any excuses for the want of these conveniences, and as their wants and comforts he won his way to the hearts of his tenantry, and was beloved by all. For a long time a large group of humble mourners which occupied a prominent position on the Abbey at the funeral was composed of the poor people of Romsey over whom her daughter, testified as clearly to his goodness as the titled kindred and friends of a higher rank. The most touching part of the spectacle last Friday. By his superior tenantry he was respected and beloved. By his labourers he was regarded with affection and gratitude. He was not one who referred the interests of those who tilled his lands to an agent, and contented himself with the occasional sight of a face in the field, but was in close into contact with all who held land under him. A new occupant invariably was summoned to the house to be seen by him. On one occasion a young man, who had held one of his Lordship's farms some years, introduced his wife to the notice of the latter on the highway of the Broadlands estate. The two proceeded, by appointment, to the mansion, and on being waited upon by the visitors, the latter said to the younger, with a good deal of nervous confusion, "How shall I address "you?" "Why, as you always have done," was the reply. "But, sir," "was the reply; "my Lord." "But, how often shall I bring it "up?" replied the rustic. "Why, as often as you like," said my "Sir, when you don't say 'my Lord.'" But, at the sight of his Lordship, it was impossible for the visitor, poor fellow, to keep to any consistency and of every sentence, in spite of various ineffectual efforts to remember admonished, by means of a reminder by the posterior reminders administered, by means of a reminder by the "Sir," when he said "my Lord." However, the party retired from the room delighted with "his Honours" affability and kind manner. "I've took an oath," exclaimed the uncle, letting out his pet-up feelings. "I'm not so big a man as I was, not by a full inch! But, "by what a man he is! I'll never be pale a ticket to vote for him as comfortable he makes one!"

Lord Palmerston was an intelligent encourager of all landed improvements. He was ever ready to expend money for those who desired better cottages, and to assist in the building operations of a moderate interest upon it. He was adverse to extreme expenditure. That is to say he was opposed to all ornamental erections. He had spent a considerable sum of money in improving such buildings, but has left only one or two specimens of new homesteads constructed on what he considered to be the best principles.

Though a keen sportsman he was by no means arbitrary in the matter of game. It is very certain that he never preserved to the injury of his tenantry without being perfectly willing—nay, anxious—to compensate them for the damage done. Much more might be added from a store of personal recollection, but enough has been recorded to show the practical habit or character of the man in dealing with his private affairs—enough to show that the hand which guided the state was handsome with the helm of State could simultaneously grasp and guide the plough.



MEMBERS OUT OF PARLIAMENT.

The desire which has for some years been prevalent amongst constituencies to meet their representatives during the recess seems to be in course of gratification this year in an unusual manner. Instead of members calling electors together and treating them to dry speeches (more or less dry), electors invite members to feasts, where they, of course, expect the ordinary amount of wining accommodated with the usual flow of soul. These banquets, occurring just after a general election, suggest considerations whether they are not practically evasions of that part of the law against corrupt practices at elections which has reference to treating. Strictly speaking, treating may be committed as well before as during an election. On the face of it, the voters ask the chosen of their votes to feast with them; but cases have occurred in which the party may have been under suspicion that members, though nominally guests, are in reality entertainers. Such suspicions may be groundless, as may be the case in festive event which once followed the election of a new member for a large manufacturing borough. The electors, in a fit of enthusiasm at having secured a wealthy and influential representative, determined to invite him to a dinner; and the suggestion was adopted with great readiness. The enthusiasm in this instance was fixed at an amount which placed them within easy reach of the ten-pound occupiers, and it was logically supposed that the banqueting would be plain and solid, and feast mainly politic-intellectual. The venue was held at one of the great taverns where patronage is said to run with change on a liberal and handsome scale; and, when some of the uninitiated guests entered the room, they were astonished to perceive that the table which would far exceed the usual limits within which charity bunyans. Those who had not had that experience in the same establishment had been sitting for a week before the festal day, and upon its eve had been in a state of fear lest the supply should run short of provisions. When the moment of projection arrived, the appearance of things probably should run short of provisions. When the moment of projection arrived, the appearance of things probably should run short of provisions. When the moment of projection arrived, the appearance of things probably

VISIT OF THE PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF WALES TO LIVERPOOL

THE departure of their Royal Highnesses, on Friday week, from Knowsley Hall, Lancashire, where they had been staying with the Earl of Derby since the Monday before, was attended with no circumstances worthy of remark. They were escorted by their noble host and Captain Stanley to the Huyton station of the Liverpool and Manchester Railway, where they entered the saloon carriages which were in waiting to be attached to the express up-train, and by this proceeded, at twelve o'clock, to Ellesworth, on the London and North-Western main line, thence going, by a special train, to Sandringham, in Norfolk. The visit of the Prince and Princess to the town of Liverpool, on Tuesday week, was made the occasion of general festivity, some Illustrations of which are engraved for this Paper. The Royal party left Knowsley at eleven o'clock, calling at Croxteth Park for the Earl of Sefton's party; and the procession, when it left Croxteth Park and entered West Derby village, consisted of seven carriages. In the first carriage, an open landau, drawn by four horses and preceded by outriders, were the Prince and Princess of Wales and the Earl and Countess of Derby. Lieutenant-General Sir John Jones, in full uniform, brought up the military escort. In the remaining carriages were Lord Stanley, M.P.; the Hon. Mrs. Stonor, the Marquis and Marchioness of Bath, the Earl and Countess of Dalkeith, Lieutenant-General Knollys, and Major Grey. The route through the town, for two miles and a half, was decorated with a profuse display of flags. Two elegant arches, erected at the expense of Mr. Preston, the High Sheriff of the county, and Mr. R. C. Gardner, an ex-mayor of Liverpool, spanned the road at the entrances to the town; and in Church-street a handsome triumphal arch, which had occupied three days and nights in construction, and cost about £400, had been thrown up by Messrs. Jeffery, and Co., of Compton House, the Liverpool representatives of Messrs. Howell and James. An immense crowd of people all along the line of procession hailed the Prince and Princess with the heartiest acclamations.

The Royal party, being bound for a cruise on the river, reached the Prince's Landing-stage at a quarter to one, and were received by the Mayor (Mr. Lawrence). Their approach to the stage was welcomed with enthusiastic cheering, and the artillery volunteer corps of Colonel MacIver presented arms, while the band played "God bless the Prince of Wales." Their Royal Highnesses embarked on board the saloon-steamer Woodside, which immediately steamed towards the south end, led by the Mersey Docks and Harbours Board tender Alert. In the wake of the Alert were the man-of-war tender Goshawk, the Cunard tender Satellite, the Sylph and the Sprite, belonging to the South-end Ferry Company; the river steamers Cheshire, Knight Templar, Samson, Secretary, Royal Arch, and Sea King, besides a large number of vessels of all shapes and sizes, decked with the gayest colours. The utmost good order prevailed, both on the stage and in the manner in which the vessels got away. The approach from the pier to the point of embarkation on the stage was beneath a sort of dome, rising on the sides of the bridge, and draped inside with red, white, and blue, bound with rosettes, ending in a tent-shaped awning at the side of the stage.

The steamer Woodside is one which plies between Liverpool and Birkenhead, and which was lent for the occasion by the Birkenhead Commissioners—the chairman, Mr. W. Hind, and Mr. H. K. Aspinall, the chairman of the Ferry Committee, representing that body. The vessel had been newly painted and furnished for the occasion, the cabins and upper deck being carpeted. A ladies' saloon was set apart for the special use of the Princess, but her Royal Highness and the Prince preferred the saloon-deck, where chairs were provided for the Royal party. During the greater part of the cruise the weather was fair, till, on nearing the north shore, a chilling shower drove a portion of the company into the shelter of the cabins; but the Prince and Princess, defiant of weather, stayed on deck throughout. The scene from the Woodside was most extraordinary. Every available space on both sides of the river was thronged with human beings, while there were about thirty steamers, filled with crowds of eager spectators, who, when lucky enough to get in sight of the Prince or Princess, cheered most lustily. So eager were the captains of the various steamers to get alongside the Woodside, that all police regulations were set at defiance, and the excitement of the scene at times produced accidental collisions, amidst a chorus of expletives from savage captains, mates, and sailors. Near Birkenhead Ferry, where the landing-stage was densely crowded, the Woodside steamed slowly. The Woodside next passed her Majesty's ship Donegal, with her yards manned and the band of the Marines playing a loyal air, a Royal salute having been previously fired on passing the training-school frigate Conway, used for educating officers for the mercantile marine. The Prince and Princess here gracefully acknowledged the hearty cheers of the smart lads, who manned the yards to the very topmasts. After steaming past the reformatory-ships Akbar and Clarence and the training-ship Indefatigable, the yards of which were also manned, as well as the famous Cunard steamer Persia, decorated from stem to stern with the gayest bunting, the Woodside turned her head again to the Liverpool pier, where the company landed amidst enthusiastic cheers, the men of the Cunard volunteer company, headed by Colonel MacIver, presenting arms, the band playing "God Save the Queen."

The Royal party then entered the carriages again and drove off to the Townhall, where the Mayor entertained them at a déjeûner in the large ball room, which was superbly decorated with banners. About eighty guests were present, including the Lord Lieutenant, Lady C. Molyneux, the High Sheriff and Mrs. Preston, Sir Thomas and Lady Hesketh; Admiral George Evans, R.N.; the Mayor of Manchester, the Lord Mayor of Dublin, and most of the leading merchants of Liverpool. In the auto-room the band of the Grenadier Guards, under Mr. D. Godfrey, played a selection of music. After the dejeuner the Prince had Princess were evidently pleased with their reception in Liverpool.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

Illustrations of Architecture and Ornament. Drawn and Etched by J. B. Waring. (Day and Son.) If architectural and decorative art does not continue to advance it will not be for want of publishing aegis and examples. Immediately succeeding the publication of Mr. Ayling's photographs from the numerous and valuable examples of Italian Art (which we reviewed a fortnight back) appears, under the title given above, another and instructive collection of examples of mediæval, and, rightly viewed, chiefly derived from the Middle Ages and architecture and ornament, chiefly derived from the Middle Ages and Renaissance. Mr. Waring has very properly treated his subjects in a pictorial rather than in the usual architectural manner. The book is designed evidently to gratify the man of taste, and to be comprehensive enough to serve as a compendium for the amateur; but such a collection should only be used as a means to an end, and not as a storehouse of models for reproduction. Many of the subjects have, we believe, been selected chiefly from the originals; the character of the several periods and diverse styles is always preserved, and the drawings of the various objects under consideration. The great advance in "ornamention," as well as sculpture, made by, and contemporary with, the Pisani, is exemplified in the illustrations. But Mr. Waring certainly seems to be rather behind hand in the manifestations, in our day, of the Renaissance, whose most recent research in architecture, in our opinion, is not to be found in pamphlets, that the whole of that advance is due to Nicolo Fusano and his study of ancient remains. Italians are a strong German (? Netherlandish) element in the Italian arts in the illustrations of the exquisite ornament of the Hispano-Arabian works in the Alhambra and the Generalife, and of the section of which it is itself exemplifying the matchless metal-work of Augsburg and other German towns, including more than one specimen of Peter Vischer. The value of such a delightful work is further enhanced by a number of beautifully-drawn representations of plants suitable for ornament. In one of the examples we are glad to recognise the belief that the iris evidently, and not the lily, was the origin of the fleur-de-lis.

Life and Letters of the Rev. F. W. Robertson, M.A. Edited by Stopford A. Brooke, M.A. (Smith, Elder, and Co.) Monday, Monday Aug. 23, 1858, a singular sight was to be seen at Brighton. No great man with a yard of titles after his name was lying in state, and no great crowd was there, from Montpelier-road to the extramural cemetery grave; and yet there were blinds taken in front, and all the balconies shops were closed, nor were the hearses and mutes and the plumes. The quiet mourners who followed the humble funeral were crowd, and around the open grave of a dead servant of the English Church gathered Jew, and Catholic, and Unitarian, and Baptist, and Quaker, and Churchman. Two thousand persons were congregated there to pay the last honour to a man who, while living, strove by his character to make known; he must have possessed of such a man possessed some high gift, some rare power of winning some rare gifts or powers of such different stations, sentiments, and creeds. Whether it was his Christianity, or his manliness, or his genius, or his sympathy, or whatever other quality there may be that enlists regard, which had given the dead so much influence over the hearts of the Rev. F. W. Robertson" and determine for themselves. There can be few to whom Mr. Robertson's sermons are not—at least in their printed form—familiar known; and they who admire and delight in the sermons will be glad to become acquainted, even more intimately, with the man who so endowed by nature with excellent parts, and he gratefully acknowledged and best adorned his gratitude for the many intellectual endowments. It is probable that the high idea of him which many have derived from his sermons will be sanctified by a closer and better intercan derived from his sermons will be sanctified by a closer and better intercourse; they will see in him extraordinary weakness as well as extraordinary power; they will rejoice over his generous sympathies, and his love of truth, his high appreciation of what is true, and the undaunted front he presented to the attacks of ignorance, or envy, or calumny; but they will perhaps grow deferential. His character was one which might not unfrequently resembles wild abuse, the use of which, even in the private correspondence of a Christian minister, is to be regretted and cannot be excused. He says (vol. ii. p. 18) "The Evangelicalism (so called) of the Record is an emasculated corpse, without life in itself, and without vitality, lying, and shameless." It is, perhaps, all true, but even the cultivation of a moral taste, such as a layman might have, will be considered by many as more abusive. Then, again, at p. 80, he is speaking of a criticism which appeared in the "Times" and says, "it is not my Mr. Tennyson is to be expected to make the statement of it intelligible at first sight, or to engage the attention. Then comes the criticism about the whole being exaggerated, and expressed sometimes in terms of amatory fondness. Exaggeration is one of course; but to treat the poem as a 'political utterance' or political action!" The rev. gentleman differed from the reviewer, most consequently in his him penny-a-liner, and thought him for being a "paid litterateur." How foolish the sneer is may appear to anyone who will reflect with what force the reviewer might have objected that will "paid person," or "paid servant of Christ," or "paid minister of the Gospel." The rev. gentleman also speaks of a certain "fair conservative" writer. Why a reviewer should be falsely called a penny-a-liner is not quite clear, nor is the offence committed by unconsciously (who, by-the-way, is and who may be a better Christian than the best tichet-and-bias man, and who may be a better clergyman who is layman, and, because he is paid, period at by a clergyman who is not paid, can only be accounted for on the self-paid (sometimes) the ground that clergymen out of the pulpit be "paid ministers" just as irritable laymen. And, for this reason, it were rise" just as irritable laymen. And, for this reason, it were desirable to take one's ideas of the Rev. F. W. Robertson from his sermons rather than from his letters. The story of his life, gathered partly from his own writings, partly from contributions faithfully and judiciously compiled by a loving friend, is interesting and instructive, but it leads us less to admire what he was than to wonder that, being what he was, he wrought so great and good a work. He was an energetic preacher, a forcible champion, a tender-hearted, and, and graceful preacher, a heart-minded man; but it is clear from these two most points, a heart-minded man; but it is clear from these two candid and very readable volumes that he was self-conscious to querulous, impatient of contradiction, and vehement of language, even to abuse. Let us conclude with the enthusiastic editor's words :—"His books may perish, his memory fade, his opinions be superseded, as in God's progressive education of the Universal Church we learn to see more clearly into Truths whose (sic) relations are now obscure; but the Work which he has done upon human hearts is as imperishable as his own immortal Life."

Lectures on Art. By John Ruskin. (Edinburgh: William P. Nimmo.) The author calls, on the titlepage, his work "a supplement to the present state, treatment, and preservation of oil-paintings." His scope, therefore, is wide, and at the first glance we are surprised to see how small a volume was required for his purpose. But, on looking into the preface, it is discovered that he had no intention—nor, indeed, can he as first parochially imagined—of tutoring upon a full criticism of the most remarkable ancient and modern paintings in existence into a compilation, interspersed with original remarks and trite moral reflections of the lives and schools of the most renowned painters. His object has been "careful selection, distinctness, and brevity;" and he has for the most part succeeded. The book is a valuable one, however, by omitting the moral reflections. Mr. Wornum's more elaborate work will claim the gratitude of those who desire to possess a more detailed knowledge; but "An Artist" has compiled what will suffice for others. The style of "An Artist" is unpretending, and though more lengthened than what he has to say seems to require; once, at least, he is profane when he says (p. 236) "Heaven and Earth will pass away, but Titian's colour will remain." "Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not; to such belongeth the kingdom of heaven" is surely a far better and truer sentiment of the fashionable newspaper's obituary notices in the expression of "a good Christian lady," when the person to be so vended was, of course, prefer to keep up their acquaintance with the ancient Romans, and, in their own language, Pagans. Montaigne, and who would reject, perhaps somewhat indignantly, the notion of suppressing or altering a single line of the Essays on account of their heathenish sentiments. But for those less accustomed to his free and fearless confessions, the following extract from the preface to the Cambridge way of talking the present compositions, will be a fair specimen of the tone of the entire work:—"Of the first, I have only to say, that, owing to the perusal of thoughtful women, he will have acquired a habit of classically correct, and will be conscious much towards promoting a real communion of sympathy and intelligence between the one sex and the other. In short, Montaigne's Essays was the object he had in view, and he has certainly succeeded in writing a book of a most delightful character. He has resorted largely to the old version by Florio as well as to the more modern one by Cotton, and has, therefore, so far, at least, as myriads of scarified authors are concerned, the stone bids fair to be permanently removed. The two concluding chapters contain which please, and though there are occasional evidences of haste in the composition, on the whole it is a production we had power, the author, on the whole, will, no doubt, hereafter write better.

The Butterfly's Ball and Grasshopper's Feast. By Henry Mayhew. (Psychanthropology. By Robert Thomas Stoddart.) Mr. Henry Mayhew's "Ope of Sut" is a book for psychologists, about which one is almost at wit's end to say anything. What with bumps on the forehead, and bumps on the back of the head, and bumps on the crown of the nose, and mouth, and chin, the phrenological, and chirognomical, and other solutathist physiognomical inspection for the usual kind of competition examination; and, what with the "anthropological" and "psychological" theories, enriches this essay with an "anthropological catholicon, melodrama of the Sheen, Ham, Japhet, and other scriptural and unscriptural personages, of whom it must be confessed we have no better acquaintance than we possess. Having drawn attention to the book or pamphlet, what more is required of us? We have no knowledge of the science, and have no time to study it.

The Butterfly's Ball and Grasshopper's Feast. By Frederika Bremer. Translated by Mary Howitt. (Illustrated by Alfred Bodder.) A very pretty book, outside and inside. The three stories contained in it are "The Butterfly's Ball," "Wise Will," and "Lisa." We recommended, except for a few religious conceits, to youthful readers. It yields good mental entertainment, and is cheap.

Poems. By Jean Ingelow. (Frederick Warne and Co.) A book for boys. It is decorated "with illustrations printed in colours by a process which, from certain of the specimens, is eminent artists;" and promises to satisfy the yearnings of those to whose tastes it appeals.

MUSIC.

The short series of performances at Her Majesty's Theatre will terminate this evening. The operas have been "Fidelio" "Faust," "Norma," "Don Giovanni," and "Le Nozze di Figaro," in which the principal parts have been sustained by Mdlle. Titiens, with her powerful and highly dramatic and vocal display. Mdlle. Titiens has even more than her usual dramatic and vocal power in the character of Donna Anna, and receives the admirable personation of Don Giovanni—the most arduous character on the musical stage. Mdlle. Titiens has rarely appeared to greater advantage, and Signor Stagno has given good promise of being one of the most accomplished tenors of the day. Signor Tagliafico performed the Leporello with extraordinary success. The theatre has been crowded every night, and the audiences have been enthusiastic in their applause.

At the Royal English Opera, Covent-garden, the "Africaine" continues to draw good houses. The character of Selika, which was at one performed by Mdlle. Lagrua, with my Adams. This expedient has been devised, we suppose, for the purpose of affording to the concerning chance of the opera, but it is not to be commended. When a part has been assigned to an actress it possess vitality, we are inclined to give it to a more competent representative, which cannot be alleged in the present instance. Mr. Harrison's Vasco da Gama is in rehearsal, and will probably be produced next week.

Signor Arditi's series of vocal and instrumental concerts at Her Majesty's Theatre is to begin on Saturday next. We may expect from this able musician performances full of interesting novelties.

Mdlle. Titiens, we understand, is about to visit her native city, Hamburg, before the beginning of the season at Her Majesty's Theatre.

Mdme. Arabella Goddard is giving a series of pianoforte recitals at Brighton. The first took place at the Royal Pavilion on the 31st of October, when the fair pianist was received with enthusiasm by a crowded and fashionable audience. The second will be given on Thursday next.

The professorship of music in the University of Edinburgh, having become vacant by the death of the late Mr. Donaldson, the Senatus Academicus have elected Mr. Herbert Stanley Oakeley as his successor. Among the candidates were Mr. Hullah, Mr. Macfarren, and several other eminent musicians. Mr. Oakeley is the second son of the late Sir Robert Oakeley, Bart., formerly Archdeacon of Colchester. His musical connections for the last few years are not unknown to the public.

Mrs. John Macfarren's soirée, on Thursday, the 2nd inst., in the theatre of the Islington Literary Society, was attended with remarkable success. Mrs. Macfarren played a selection from the pianoforte works of Beethoven, Hummel, Weber, and other classical masters; and her performances were interspersed with vocal pieces by Miss Berry, a young and accomplished singer, who is rapidly rising to eminence.

We hear that Vincent Wallace has left an unfinished opera, which Balfe is now employed in completing.

THE THEATRES.

On Saturday the great revival of the season at Drury Lane was produced—Shakespeare's historical tragedy of "King John." One of the most regular of the plays of our great poet, this tragedy is so well fitted and so easily adapted to the stage that scarcely any revival has, in proportion to its merits, expended their resources on its illustration. Mr. Macready, Mr. Phelps, Mr. Charles Kean, and Mr. Douglass have alike exerted themselves in this direction, and with great success; and now Messrs. Falconer and Chatterton have again compelled for the laurels. With the aid of Mr. May and Mr. Beverley, they have provided grander dresses and more beautiful scenery than their predecessors. Of the latter we may enumerate that in the hall of justice, of Northampton Castle, and of Swinstead Abbey, with its gardens; all of which are perspective, for scenic taste, and a sensible attention of arrangement, are passing excellent. Of the acting, much of it is so well known that little need be said. Mr. Phelps, in King John, was more than usually careful, judicious, and impressive. Mr. Anderson's Faulconbridge was the ancient order, not materially different from what it was in Mr. Macready's time, and Mr. Swinbourne in Hubert was decidedly good. Miss Heath Glyndon's Blanche is a novelty in her line, being sustained by Master Percy Roselle, whose pantomimic performances have won for him no small deserved celebrity in a very extensive circle. Miss Fanny Huddart's Constance must always be a prominent feature, and Miss Atkinson was supported in the character of Queen Elinor with a due attention to degree of merit. Coarse and conventional as it is, it claims praise for its energy. Its pantomimic power is not to be denied. It is decidedly in pathos as it is overabundant in vehemence. Such shortcomings, however, are not to be laid to the actress, but to the author, who will pleased with the general spectacle to be critical as to details. It were, however, to be wished that Miss Atkinson would re-adapt the part, if she would not remove verbal errors in the text into which she habitually slips to correct some of the most glaring of the Old Dramatist shall be fallen. Everything on such a stage as that of Old Drury should be perfect, and every one performer, whether male or female, who ventures on an incautious delivery or is guilty of a single mispronunciation, is deficient in justice to the public, and in failing to uphold standard must be insisted on.

The Lyceum re-opened on Monday, and, as promised, with a new piece. The latter has been adapted from an old French drama, entitled, "Lazare le Pâtre," by Mr. Palgrave Simpson, and has been

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS.

LADY AUGUSTA OGTON.

Lady Augusta Maria Cotton, who died on the 1st inst., was the eldest daughter of George William, seventh Earl of Coventry, by his second wife, Mary, daughter and co-heir of Sir Abraham Pitchen, Knt., and was grandaunt of George William, ninth and present Earl of Coventry. Her Ladyship was born Sept. 11, 1780, and married, Dec. 31, 1801, to the late Illustrious Field Marshal Lord Combermere's first cousin, the late colonel-general Sir Willoughby Cotton, G.C.B., K.C.H., who died May 4, 1860, leaving issue by her two sons, Captain Willoughby Cotton, who died in 1851, Lord Mayor General Corbet Cotton, and a daughter, Augusta Mary, widow of Colonel Henry Vaughan Brooke, C.B.

MAJOR-GENERAL BYE.

Major-General John Eyre, who died, on the 31st ult., at Chichester, in his seventy-eighth year, was a Peninsular officer, having served in the 52nd Regiment of the Royal Artillery, in June, 1807, as Second Lieutenant, and he took part in the campaigns in Portugal and the south of France under Lord Lynedoch, and was present at the advance upon Madrid and the retreat to Corunna, in 1808 and 1809. He had also seen much service in the West Indies, and was with the 52nd Regiment at Corunna, Java in the West Indies, on continental service, for eighteen years; and was subsequently in command of the Royal Artillery at the Cape of Good Hope, from 1837 to May, 1841. Major-General Eyre was also a Lieutenant-Colonel in 1846; a Colonel, June 20, 1854; and a Major-General in 1857.

COLONEL FARRER.

Lieutenant-Colonel Arthur C. Farrer, of the 71st Highland Light Infantry, who died, on the 20th ult., at the Castle, Edinburgh, after a few days' illness, of typhoid fever, was a scion of the Farrers, Baronets, of Melford Hall, Suffolk, which family is a branch of that of Farrer, of Ewood, in Yorkshire. He was the son of the late Rev. Mary Farrer, Rector of Stanhope, Durham) of the late Major-General John Bebeler Farrer, C.B., of the Royal Artillery, who commanded the artillery of the Light Division, and was grandson of the Venerable Archdeacon Sir Hyde Farrer, Bart., K.C.B., the hero of the Dargenhaik. He was born in 1827, entered the Scottish county in 1846, and was much wounded in the trenches at Sebastopol, in the Crimean War, including the taking of Kertch and Yenikale, for which he obtained a medal and clasp. Also, during the mutiny, at the capture of Lucknow, and the Turkish medal. He, in 1868, embarked with the regiment from Malta and proceeded overland, to India, where he was commissioned to command throughout the mutiny; and when the regiment was in Central India he acted as A.D.C. officer of the field force under Sir Hugh Rose, and was in the action at the actions of Raghur, Mongrowlee, and Sindwah, in all which he received honourable mention in despatches, and commendation from the Queen's Major, he received a medal with clasps. Farrer commanded, at Gorna, the field force from September, 1864, to November, 1865, and was also in command in the late war in the North-west frontier of India, and was with Sir Craig Ficket, during a portion of which time he commanded the 71st on the bottom of his Colonel, was frequently mentioned in despatches by the Commander-in-Chief in his despatches; and on the conclusion of the war he was raised to the rank of Brevet-Lieutenant-Colonel. The late Lieutenant-Colonel Farrer's immediate family, it should be added, has for three generations been distinguished in the army and navy service of this country.

MR. COMMISSIONER PUNDLEMAGE.

John Somerset Davis Pundlemage, Esq., barrister-at-law, and a Commissioner of the Court of Bankruptcy, died on the 1st inst., at his residence, 10, Park-crescent, Portland-place, after a short illness, in the 70th year of his age. John Pundlemage, Esq., K.C., and was the eldest son of the late John Pundlemage, Esq., formerly chief of the Accountants' department, and statistical department of the Board of Trade. He was born in 1787, and was originally an officer in the 21st Regiment of Foot, and saw much active service in the Peninsula and in America. He was at the taking of Washington and at the Battle of Baltimore, and was also present at the battle of New Orleans. He, after being with the army of occupation in France, retired from the service, and was appointed a Commissioner of Bankruptcy. He was called to the Bar by the Honourable Society of Lincoln's Inn, in 1838, and was appointed a Commissioner of Bankruptcy, in 1847. He wrote, in 1851, a standard treatise on Medical Jurisprudence. He was continued in his commissionership under the new arrangements of the Court of Bankruptcy of 1859; and he was in the discharge of his duties up to his death. Mr. Pundlemage was considered a very sound lawyer, not only in bankruptcy law, but in the other branches of the profession of the law, and his judgments were models of terseness, perspicuity, and legal acumen. For the last few years he was incapacitated by infirmity from discharging the important duties of his office, and Mr. Registrar Winslow has latterly ably filled the office of Judge as Deputy Commissioner of Bankruptcy in London, and leaves a family. His son, Albany Pundlemage, Esq., a writer of note on jurisprudence and general subjects, is one of the Vice-Consul and Chancellor of the Consular Court in Egypt.

PROFESSOR LINDLEY.

Dr. John Lindley, Ph. D., F.R.S., a very eminent botanist, and late Professor of Botany and as University College, London, died on the 1st inst. at the Gardeners' Chronicle, who died at his residence, Acton-green, on the 1st inst., was the son of Mr. Lindley, a writer on horticultural subjects, and was born in the neighbourhood of Norwich, where the future Professor was born, in 1799. His father's pursuits gave the son the opportunity of acquiring botanical and experience in horticulture, which he soon turned to profit. He commenced writing on botanical subjects when he was twenty-one years of age, and from that time to the day of his death contributed largely to botanical literature. His earliest works were illustrated towards new botanical systems, and they soon exceeding seven years (1820 to 1826) he came to London, and was, during the time, engaged in producing his Encyclopædia of Botany. This work was published in 1829. From that time Dr. Lindley wrote and published numerous works, books and papers on the general arrangements of the natural order of plants, each touching and advocating the natural system; and in 1846 he published his "The Vegetable Kingdom," a most elaborate work, and one of great scientific science. Dr. Lindley was also a contributor to the periodical press for his favourite subject, and he assisted the Gardeners' Chronicle from the commencement. In 1829 he was appointed to the chair of Botany, in University College, London, and he held that position for nearly thirty-five years. He was also, from 1835 till the lectures were discontinued, lecturer at the Royal Horticultural Society's garden at Chiswick. He was also, from 1861 to 1863, Professor of Botany; and from 1829 he filled with assiduity the post of under-secretary to the Royal Horticultural Society, and was for many years Civil Law, and also held an honorary degree of Ph.D. presented to him by the University of Munich. Dr. Lindley was associated with Sir William Jackson Hooker as superintendent of the Botanical Department of the Great Exhibition, the library and museum of the Horticultural Society were for many years under the charge of Professor Lindley, and greatly enhanced in value through his care.

THE REV. H. C. ARDEN.

The Rev. Henry Cotton Arden died at his seat, Longcroffe Hall, Staffordshire, after a short illness, on the 1st inst., in the 70th year of his age. He was the very large and family, Longcroffe descended to him from the ancient property of the Arden of Merevale Hall, Warwickshire, and of Park Hall, Staffordshire, in Staffordshire. According to Sir William Dugdale's "History of Warwickshire," the Ardens, Drummond's "Noble Families of England," were of Saxon origin, and the eldest in England, having descended from the Saxon Kings at least 100 years before the Conquest. Their ancestral seat was Arden, in Yorkshire, and Sir Edward Arden, the unfortunate Sheriff of Warwickshire and Staffordshire, in the Reigns of the Tudors and Stuarts, and Sir Robert Arden, Master of the Rolls, in the Reign of Queen Elizabeth, were of this family. He, however, on inheriting the estates of his uncle, the late Mr. Arden, of Longcroffe Hall, assumed the name and surname of Arden only, and, as such, served as Sheriff of Limerick; but, in 1795, he assumed the additional surname of Cotton, in compliance with a request of his uncle, and was created Baron Allesley and Viscount Gort in 1816. It should also be added that in mentioning "the Gort family" in connection with Limerick he was a period in Parliament for that city, and to include both the Smythe, who were the family of the first Viscount, and the Verekers, who now bear the title.

WILLS AND BEQUESTS.

The will of Lieutenant-General George William Aylmer Lloyd, C.B., late of Major's Indian army on the Bengal establishment, late of Darjeeling, in the East Indies, where he died on the 20th of May last, was proved in the London Court, on the 3rd ult., by the Rev. Arthur Forbes Lloyd, Royal Dragoons, and Captain Thomas Townend, Esqs., of Brighton, being executors to William Lloyd, Esq., the nephew, and Caroline Lloyd, the relict. The personality in this case was sworn under £12,000. The will was first proved in Calcutta. It bears date March 21, 1861; and a codicil, June 8, 1865. The gallant General has left numerous legacies to his friends, leaving to Joy, in addition to her share of a moiety of his property, a life interest over £7000 Three per Cents; an annuity of £100 from the Bengal Fund, which he had subscribed; and an annuity of £400 from the Company's paper in the bank of Bengal. She also takes a life interest in his plate, jewellery, and household furniture, he leaves the reversion of his property to his said nephew, William Lloyd. There are several legacies of £1000 and other amounts left to his nephews, nieces, cousins, and other relatives.

The will of Thomas Townend, Esq., of Brighton, was proved in London, and the personalty sworn under £140,000. The executors and trustees appointed are Stephen Percy Groves, Esq., of Charing-cross; Richard Sykes, Esq., of Canterbury, Chester; and Richard Drake, Esq., of Sidmouth, Kent. The will, with a codicil, was dated 1865, and the deceaser died on the 19th of October, in the ripe age of seventy-four. He bequeaths to his wife for her life his residence, Eastern-terrace, Brighton, with coach-house, &c.; and leaves her the carriages, horses, plate, linen, carriage, and horses for her own absolute use, and the enjoyment of the pictures for her life, which, at her decease, are bequeathed to the Brighton Museum. He gives to his wife an annuity of £1000 in addition to the marriage settlement, and £200 immediate. An estate at Faversham, Kent, he has left to his wife as a residence, which, at her decease, is to pass to his daughter Elizabeth, the wife of William Hall, and afterwards to his grandson, William Townend Hall. He gives £1000 to his son-in-law, William Hall, his son, Thomas Richard Townend, from a sum of £15,000 to be invested for his benefit there is secured a life interest in £5000 Three per Cent Consols. William Townend Hall is also to be annuity of £100. He appoints his said daughter residuary legatee for her own absolute use. The will is dated 1865.

The late Miss Sarah Abraham, of Raby-place, Bath, who died in July last, has by her will left the following charitable bequests, payable from her funded property:—£1000 to the Incorporated Society for Building Churches, £1000 to the Church Missionary Society, and the Church Pastoral Aid Society, each £1000. To the Bible Society, £1000; and £1000 to be divided amongst the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, the Colonial Church and School Society, the Bristol Clerical Educational Fund, the Bath Clerical and the London Clerical Educational Society, London Clerical Educational Aid Fund, Church Educational Society for Ireland, Irish Society, Sackville-street, Dublin, Church Education Mission, Irish Punitentiary, Society of Conscience Society, Ireland; Mairs Protestant College, and to the Clergy Orphan Corporation, Dublin, and the Irish Church Missions to Roman Catholics, Bath, and at Casterton, the Naval and Military Bible Society, the Lord's Day Observance Society, Hibernian Bible Society, Protestant Society, the Irish Reformation Society, each £1000. The Prayer-Book and Homily Society, the Missions to Seamen, the London Society for Promoting Christianity amongst the Jews, the Religious Tract Society, the Scripture Readers' Society, Bath House of Protestation, Bath Female Refuge, and the Bath Aged Institution each £500. Making in the whole £16,000.

CHESS.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

A MEMBER, &c.—The British Chess Association.—There are no permanent offices attached to this society. An attempt was made at the meeting held to report the progress of the Handbook to appoint a Secretary, but the matter fell through. Mr. Lord has undertaken, for a consideration, to act when required. The abolition, however, very properly declined to entertain the proposition, as one foreign to the purpose of the meeting. The Handbook is now in the hands of the printers, and the necessary arrangements for which a meeting will be convened, will be under the superintendship of the Earl of Cotland, and will be held in the Egyptian Hall, Mansion-house, on the day before the annual meeting of the Association. We have reason to believe that the Handbook will be published in time to enable the Secretary, assisted by the Committee, to have completed the necessary arrangements for the meeting.

Rev. G. Hutchinson has gained the first prize; and Mr. G. F. Barry, of Dublin, the second prize, in the Problem Tourney of the Dublin University Magazine. In the former, Mr. Barry has taken the second place, and Mr. Hutchinson the seventh. Three commending numbers are, Mr. Long, who withdrew from the contest when he found he could not win a prize; Mr. Wormald, and Mr. Hunter.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

No. 1343.—VOL. XLVII. SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 18, 1865. WITH A SUPPLEMENT, FIVEPENCE

FIRST REPORT ON THE CATTLE PLAGUE.

THE wide extent of country over which the cattle plague has become prevalent, and the fearful ravages which mark its career, have caused many to look eagerly for a report of the Commissioners appointed by the Crown to inquire into the subject. Their anxious curiosity may now satisfy itself. The Commission has published its "first" report. Whether a second will be forthcoming is, perhaps, less doubtful than whether it will be desired. But be this as it may, we hope our readers will not deem a summary of the document already published wholly devoid of interest or use.

The information collected and digested by the Commissioners respecting the origin, nature, and progress of the plague, contains little or nothing which has not long since reached the public through other channels. It was not likely to do so. In these days, what has been aptly designated "the fourth estate of the realm" discharges, in most cases that are not strictly judicial, the functions of a court of inquiry, without barrying for a special commission; and the very hardest body cannot be expected to do much more than sift the false from the true. There are no unvisited regions left for it to explore, no undiscovered or unworked mines of fact, no reserved sources of intelligence. It strikes us, therefore, as somewhat unreasonable to find fault with the Commissioners for not having stated something not previously known to the public. How and when the disease made its first appearance in a London dairy; with what frightful rapidity it extended itself in the metropolis; that in the twenty-three counties in England, two in Wales, and sixteen in Scotland; that it is highly contagious and destructive: that it is identical with the rinderpest, or steppe-murrain; that the latent is not its first appearance in this country, it having followed the "black death" in 1348-9, and revisited us in 1480, 1715, '45, and '57, causing on each occasion great havoc among our herds: and that, our predecessors declared it "incurable" may not be very novel information, but could hardly be omitted from a report designed to give an authentic account of the disease. It is better that the public should have warrant for saying of the historical portion of the Commissioners' report that "what is true is not new," than that they should have grounds for saying that "what is new is not true." It may be more plausibly urged that, so far as this portion of the document is concerned, "the game is not worth the candle."

It is, however, in the recommendations of the Commissioners, if anywhere, that one is predisposed to look for originality. These have relation, not so much to the cure as to the suppression of the disease. On one point, at least, public opinion will probably accept with approbation the suggestion of the Commission. They think that the authority to seize and slaughter vested in inspectors by the provisions of the Act should be more properly be withdrawn, or, if retained, should be exercised only in cases of wilful neglect or breach of sanitary regulations. That authority, if it could but have been intrusted exclusively to men of competent intelligence and discretion, is unexceptionable, at any rate, seemed so, in the earlier stage of the plague, just as it may be proper at the outbreak of a fire to attempt even at some cost to stamp it out. But when it became evident that the mischief had got beyond control, and that system of counteraction, the slaughtering process certain on the stockowner, and ultimately on the country, what the Commissioners justly characterise as "inevitable waste," the principle, "no compensation," a system of compulsory slaughter should be commuted by a system of compensation, and the objections to promising compensation to individuals out of the public treasury on an extensive scale appear to us unanswerable."

The practical recommendations for the suppression of the disease are, briefly, the following :—The suspension for a time, to be limited by circumstances, of all removal of cattle from one place in Great Britain to another. To this, however, five of the Commissioners objected as impracticable. On the alternative, in the event of the total stoppage of all movement of cattle being considered an unnecessarily stringent measure, it is proposed—1. To prohibit the sale of store stock at fair or market, by auction, advertisement, or private treaty, except to secure. 2. To allow cattle to be moved for immediate slaughter only, under a license for transit, to be given by magistrates in petty sessions, or inspectors under the orders of the district from which the animals cause. 3. All slaughter-houses to be licensed, and butchers to undertake that no cattle sold or consigned to them shall be removed from their premises while living. 4. All cattle to be searched at sale, and prohibited from leaving the precincts of the place in which the sale is made, except as meat; and unsold animals to remain in lairs from one market to another. 5. Infected districts to be definitely marked off from uninfected, and all exposure to the Gazette, and, until purged of all traces of the plague, compelled to retain within their boundaries every head of cattle inclosed within them; but meat certified to be fit for food to be allowed removal under proper precautions.

It remains to be seen whether her Majesty's Ministers will deem themselves justified in attempting to give practical effect to these suggestions. To do so without consulting Parliament would be considered a bold proceeding, and might expose the newly-constituted Government to the charge of overstepping the limits of the authority committed to them in this matter by the recent Act for the Prevention of Contagious Diseases among Cattle. The whole system of restrictive regulations as to the Commission would, unquestionably, prove extremely harassing in practice, and would paralyse for some time the action of an extensive industrial mechanism which now affords employment and profit to large numbers of people. Its effect upon the food market can hardly, perhaps, be calculated with even an approximation to certainty. That it would derange the normal relations of supply to demand no one can doubt, but to what extent no one can foretell. If it were once ascertained in the object, the plan might be adopted without serious hesitation: but the responsibility of enforcing it while a reasonable doubt remains as to how it will work will probably be considered by the Government too heavy to warrant their making so large a venture.

The question will at once occur whether the recommendations of the Commission have not come too late. They are based on the assumption that the plague can even now be suppressed, and they are drawn up with the single view of effecting that object. Two months ago, when the application of them might have been topical only, a reasonable hope might have been entertained that the disease could be isolated by stringent precautionary rules. Can as much be said now? Has not the wide spread of the pestilence placed it beyond the control of merely repressive agencies? Is not the area become too large for the counteractive measures proposed? Of course, the wider it is the greater is the difficulty of enforcing regulations, and the more numerous are the chances of their being here and there evaded; and, equally of course, the more serious will be the mischief inflicted upon private property by arbitrary interference. Our Continental neighbours who are most exposed to the invasions of the plague usually succeed, it is true, in extinguishing it by isolation and suppression; but then they so deal with it in the first instance, and when it may be locally encountered. It is comparatively easy to draw a cordon round a frontier district, and within its narrow limits to ensure the slaughter of the stricken cattle; but when the area of matter when the same system requires to be carried out over a whole kingdom. In that case the remedy is likely enough to be found impracticable, or, if practicable, worse than the disease.

Since the Commission sat facts have been brought to light which will probably turn the thoughts of stock-owners in the direction rather of everything than of slaughter. It has been as it has been averred on respectable authority, that in Holland forty-five per cent of the cattle attacked by the plague have recovered under one system of medical treatment, and seventy-three per cent under another system, the question will force itself upon the public mind whether the course upon which we are proceeding in this country might not be altered with some promise of success. If we cannot extirpate the disease by preventive measures, may we not bring it under control by curative methods? Here, at least, is a field for very useful investigation by the Commission. We want to be assured of the facts before they may be, that strong light on this point; and if the Commission present a second report, we trust they will deem it worth their while to sift whatever evidence may be offered to them on this head, and unreservedly make the public acquainted with the conclusions it may warrant.

THE ROYAL ALBERT INFIRMARY.

THE Number of this Journal for August 13, 1864, contained an illustration of the ceremony of laying the foundation-stone of the Royal Albert Infirmary, at Bishop-Wearmouth. On the occasion of that occasion, it may be remembered, Prince Leopold, the Queen's youngest son, who is now the heir-presumptive to the crown of Belgium, came to perform the ceremony, under the guidance of Mr. Arthur Helps, the well-known author and Clerk of the Privy Council, who is also the proprietor of some estates at Bishop-Wearmouth, and by whose efforts mainly the Infirmary has been founded. It has been built from the sale of the memoir and speeches of the late Prince Consort, edited by Mr. Helps, and has been placed in the hands of the Bishop-Wearmouth Royal Infirmary. There circumstances partly explain the presence of their Royal Highnesses Princesses Helena and Louise, with Prince Arthur, at the opening ceremony of the institution on Tuesday week, and the unveiling of a statue of their lamented father, the gift of Mr. P. Forster, Baron Alnwyck of Sunderland, which has been placed over the portico of the front entrance. The Infirmary, which was originally designed to contain but sixty beds, is now (they were met by the Mayor and Corporation of Southampton, and by Mr. Dan Mitchell, the High Bailiff of Bishop-Wearmouth, at the railway station, and four, escorted by the Hants Mounted Rifle Volunteers. The streets were decorated with flags and evergreens, and the weather, which was merely ringing. Having taken luncheon, the Royal party went, at two o'clock, to the infirmary, where a large assembly was expecting their appearance. The Royal party was received with enthusiastic cheers, and officials having been introduced to their Royal Highnesses, Mr. Dowell, the Mayor, and Mr. Mitchell, Southampton. Mr. Helps, who had to witness with a short distance of the pooch facing the statue, while Mr. Dowell read an address. Royal Highness, in reply, said that he was pleased to be present at the opening of the institution on Tuesday week, and the unveiling of a statue of their lamented father, the gift of Mr. P. Forster, Baron Alnwyck of Sunderland, which has been placed over the portico of the front entrance. The Prince was pleased to see that the infirmary was now in use:

and old engravings. Two thousand actors are to figure in the pageant, and it is to cost £12,000.

SPAIN.

The Queen has been slightly indisposed at La Granja, and was confined to bed during one day.

General Espartero and Senor Olozaga having resigned their positions as members of the Progressist committee, a new election has taken place, resulting in the return of General Espartero as president of the committee. Senor Olozaga was not re-elected.

According to a Lisbon telegram, war has been declared between Spain and Chili, and the Spanish squadron has blockaded the Chilian ports.

PORTUGAL.

The Cortes are discussing the reform of the civil law and the establishment of trial by jury.

The Duke of Saldanha has published a pamphlet against the proposal for civil marriage.

Viscount Praia Grande has temporarily assumed the functions of War Minister.

BELGIUM.

The session of the Senate for 1865-6 was opened on Tuesday. During the first sitting, at which the Duke of Brabant was present, the assembly proceeded to the formation of its bureau. The following were appointed:—President, Prince de Ligne; First Vice-President, M. d'Omalius d'Halloy; Second Vice-President, Count de Tornaco; First Secretary, Baron de Rasse; Second Secretary, Count Lodovic de Robiano; Assistant Secretaries, M. de la Jaboeille and M. de Looz-Corswarem.

The Chamber of Deputies also met on Tuesday, under the presidency of M. Lange, the senior member; but, no business having been set down in his order of the day, the members separated immediately.

A Royal decree has been published, appointing M. Tesch, formerly Minister of Justice, to be Minister of State.

SWITZERLAND.

The elections to the State Council have passed off with comparative calm. The candidates of the independent party have all been elected.

ITALY.

The King arrived at Naples yesterday week, and met with an enthusiastic reception. The palace was illuminated for the occasion with Bengal lights. Next morning his Majesty, accompanied by the Ministers, the Prefect, and the Mayor of Naples, visited the various hospitals, and investigated the sanitary system now in operation. The King has contributed towards the relief of the sufferers from the epidemic. On Sunday he received the authorities of the city and a deputation of students, and subsequently visited the Clinical Hospital.

A portion of the French army has left Rome, and a second detachment will shortly follow. The Papal troops, however, will co-operate with the civil and military authorities a strict observance of the duties appertaining to the new state of things.

General Kanzler, the new Papal War Minister, it is said, has determined upon repressing brigandage with the greatest energy, and intends establishing permanent camps in the villages and districts where the brigands find shelter.

The address from Rome to Ancona is announced as completed, with the exception of the bridge over the Tiber at Calle Rosetta, which still soon be finished also.

AUSTRIA.

The Croatian Diet was opened on Sunday. The Government Commissioner urged the Diet to take into consideration the necessity of a Parliamentary union of Croatia and Austria. He also announced that the Emperor would be received shortly as King of Hungary by the Diet to send representatives to the ceremony.

At a meeting of the Diet yesterday week at the house of Baron Sztoyai, it was agreed that the following demands should be expressed in the address in reply to the speech from the throne at the approaching opening of the Hungarian Diet:—

1. The entire constitutional rights of Hungary to continue to form the basis of all further negotiations between Austria and Hungary.

2. The integrity of Hungary as established by the year 1848, forming a kingdom with Croatia and Sclavonia, to be re-established.

3. The separation of administration from the Cabinet.

4. The provisional re-establishment of contacts on the basis of the laws passed by the Hungarian Diet of 1847-8.

5. The means for conducting the Hungarian administration to be only granted on condition that the Government render responsible to the country, and remain responsible for the employment of the funds voted.

GERMANY.

Baron von Beust, the Saxon Minister for Foreign Affairs, has sent a despatch to the representatives of Saxony at Vienna and Berlin, in reference to the steps taken by the great Powers of Europe with the Porte and in reply to verbal complaints made by the Austrian and Prussian Ministers about the attitude of the Saxon Press. Baron von Beust claims for the Federal Diet the right to decide what steps may be necessary and legitimate to be pursued in the present state of affairs, and as to the attitude of the Saxon press, he says, "Before replying to the remark that the Saxon Government does not check these hostile tendencies, I must first vote to see if Russia will forbid the Prussian press advocating the destruction of the Saxon monarchy."

The English Minister to the Teutonic Confederation has also been accredited by his Government in the same capacity to the Frankfort Senate, whose Diet England has not recognised. Lord Augustus Loftus's mission is looked upon as a manifestation of the English Cabinet against the policy of the two great Saxon Powers.

PRUSSIA.

Princess Frederick Charles of Prussia was confined of a son on Tuesday morning. The King has paid a visit to the Princess.

A decree of the King has founded a new Prussian Order of Louise, to be conferred on women or young girls who may have distinguished themselves by their attachment to the duty of the highest acts of humanity and self-devotion in time of war.

Count Bray, Governor of Silesia, has conferred the order of the Black Eagle from the King.

The Government has decided on constructing a military port in the Baltic, which will be some distance from Kiel. A maritime commission, presided over by Admiral Jachmann, is engaged in discussing important propositions.

SWEDEN AND NORWAY.

A change in the views of the nobility in favour of the proposed reform of the Constitution has taken place, and several influential members of the House of Nobles, including Count Lewenhaupt and Bjoernstjerna, formerly Minister of War, have withdrawn their opposition to the measure.

The Norwegian Storthing has adopted the treaty of commerce with France without any alterations.

UNITED STATES.

The Washington Government, having received official notice of the removal of all restrictions upon American vessels in British ports, had given instructions that the same liberal hospitality and courtesy should be shown by Federal naval officers to officers of the British Navy.

The abolition of slavery and the repudiation of the Confederate debt are essential conditions for reconstruction of southern States into the Union.

President Johnson has released John Mitchell, as he intimates, not from any feeling of consideration to that individual personally, but out of respect "and as a compliment to a large section of our countrymen with whom Mitchell was previously identified." This, it is stated, he made plain to a deputation from the Fenian congress which waited upon him.

The public debt of the United States has been reduced by 4,000,000 dols. since September.

The steamer Atlanta, on reaching New York, was found to have sixty cases of cholera on board, among which were fifteen deaths, and was immediately put into quarantine.

Another correspondence between the Foreign Office and the American Minister has been published. The despatches letters are sent by Earl Russell, and are, as he intimates, the last he would have the honour to write on the subject. The further correspondence will be conducted by Lord Clarendon. Mr. Adams intimates that his Government will not insist on the arbitration which they at first suggested, and with regard to the mixed commission, he inquires what are the questions which Earl Russell would refer to it, and what the principles by which its proceedings would be regulated. Earl Russell promises a reply to those queries as soon as they can be got ready, and in the meanwhile he passes to some of the complaints made by Mr. Adams of breaches of neutrality during the war, showing how the British Government dealt with them, to vindicate this country from a violation of international law in each case.

The Shenandoah, with all her stores, was yesterday week handed over to the United States authorities at Melbourne. The officers and the crew of the Shenandoah were liberated. The Government ordered the release of all who were not British subjects, and of course, when this order was read, no one claimed to be a British subject.

CANADA.

Great alarm prevails in Canada as to the Fenian projects. The Fenians had threatened a rising there, and it was said, had a steamer ready for offensive purposes. Military preparations were being taken, and Toronto was protected.

MEXICO.

The Monitor states that the latest intelligence from Mexico confirms the news that the province of Sonora has submitted to the Emperor Maximilian, and that a deputation of Juarez has "definitively quitted the country."

The New York papers contain various accounts of battles and skirmishes in Mexico, in all of which the Imperialists were successful.

INDIA, CHINA, AND JAPAN.

A most important despatch was received at the India Office. It states that on Monday Colonel Bruce in Durbar signed a treaty of peace with Bhootan.

From China the most noticeable fact is the cessation of complications between the Chinese and foreign authorities.

From Japan we have a report of attempts to reassassinate the Tycoon.

AUSTRALIA.

MELBOURNE, Sept. 26.

The mail that leaves Victoria to-day takes to England information of a kind calculated to do anything but reflect credit upon the working of constitutional government in this colony. I have to have to inform you that, at the present moment, we are living under a kind of provisional despotism, the existence of which it is difficult to fully describe, because irresponsible. The Ministry, backed by a majority of the Assembly, have suspended the Habeas Corpus Act, and Governor Sir Charles Darling, are carrying on the business of the State in contravention of the Constitution Act. Such is the extraordinary pass of our dead-lock and how it was produced. I shall now give you a brief sketch of the events leading up to the course taken by the Ministry seems but to make "confusion worse confounded."

Last month, the Ministry introduced a Reduction Bill on address had been voted by the Legislative Assembly calling upon the Government to adopt such measures as his constitutional advisers might recommend for the reconstruction of the Legislative Council. Before this His Excellency sent two replies to this address—one to the Council and one to the Assembly. In the former he told the Council that Sir Charles assured them that he should readily adopt any measure which they might bring up for the purpose of modifying the existing state of things to an end, but informed them that it was not in his power to recommend the Crown to create new peers unless it unless the amount required were rendered legally available by an Act duly executed, and not merely by the Appropriation Act, legislative." Before the reception of this reply rumours were current to the effect that the Government had a scheme in view by which cash payments without the Appropriation Act, might be brought to be remained. Sir Charles's message was regarded as fatal to the carrying out of any such scheme. Mr. Higinbotham, the Chief Secretary, acted upon the manly stand which he had made in the interests of the Council. On the 17th inst. Mr. Higinbotham, in His Excellency next two replies to this address—one to the Council and one to the Assembly. In the former he told the Council that Sir Charles assured them that he should readily adopt any measure which they might bring up for the purpose of modifying the existing state of things to an end, but informed them that it was not in his power to recommend the Crown to create new peers unless the amount required were rendered legally available by an Act duly executed, and not merely by the Appropriation Act, legislative." Before the reception of this reply rumours were current to the effect that the Government had a scheme in view by which cash payments without the Appropriation Act might be brought to be remained. Sir Charles's message was regarded as fatal to the carrying out of any such scheme. Mr. Higinbotham, the Chief Secretary, acted upon the manly stand which he had made in the interests of the Council. On the 17th inst. Mr. Higinbotham, in a lengthy message also took this view of his Excellency's sentiments; and the Assembly, on the same night at once by Mr. Higinbotham, Judge, then, of our astonishment when, in another message to the Council, Sir Charles Darling declared his intention to suspend the Governor's second message. Mr. Verdon, the Treasurer, who made the announcement, stated that negotiations had been opened with the view of raising the money. Banks were appointed, with the view of obtaining advances to supply the temporary requirements of the day, now proposed to be met by Appropriation Act, and a Loan Act may advance whatever, on the ground of the illegality and insecurity of the proposed scheme. Mr. Higinbotham, the Chief Secretary, (at Australia) had consented. On the following day, therefore, payments were actually made by the Government, and the matter might be left remained so long without their salaries, were paid. It is worthy of remark, however, that Mr. Higinbotham, the Chief Secretary, is the sole Melbourne director of the Accommodating bank, and that the manager of the bank has been very generally blamed for lending himself and the resources of the establishment to what is in charge to carry out a political manœuvre. The managers of the five advertising banks have also been censured for not having consulted their respective shareholders as the manager of the London Chartered Bank of India, Australia, and China consulted his shareholders and treasurer, they submitted a case for the opinion of the most eminent members of the Bar, and received decided opinions as to the legality and safety of the scheme. They accordingly declined the tempting proposal.

This is not the only matter in which the Ministry are acting illegally. A clause in the Land Act, by the way, which is the Upper House, duties levied under its provisions are still being exacted, and that with no higher authority than simply a resolution of the Assembly to that effect. Another instance is the non-payment of tariff rates, and importers, being the weaker party, have no alternative but to pay the amount claimed. The result of the non-assent of the Executive in collecting rates under such circumstances, and for such a purpose, is that the Melbourne Corporation threatens to recover back their money by petition under the Act No. 40, which enables ratepayers in Victoria to sue the Queen in the Supreme Court for breach of contracts made by her. The case had been argued on demurrer, when Chief Justice Stawell delivered the startling opinion that the new customs' duties on the authority of a mere resolution of the Assembly is illegal to be levied by the Executive in accordance with the practice of the House of Commons. In the face of this decision the duties are still collected, and the Government have not ventured in the house the other night that, notwithstanding the result of the trials in the Supreme Court, the new duties would continue to be levied.

The conduct of the Governor, Sir Charles Darling, when during two nights in the Legislative Council, on the occasion of a motion for the immediate grant of supplies to be brought in, he was developing a history of the crisis, with an account of the part played by his Excellency therein. Sir Charles Darling replied that he had not been sent to the Governor for transmission. I have just learned, however, that it will not be long by the outgoing mail, and that his Excellency intends to reserve it until it be accompanied by addresses emanating from the Council and the Assembly, congratulatory of his conduct in the step up for the purpose of upholding the Ministry and the Governor in their course. In days of yore Governors have been recalled for less, as well as a complete and impartial history of the crisis; and this will, no doubt, fall its way to Mr. Cardwell shortly after the arrival of this month's mail in London. To-night, in the Assembly, the address to his Excellency, approving of his conduct, will be proposed—and carried, no doubt, by a large majority; but the significance of such an address, as compared with that of the Council, will be apparent to anyone who has given the slightest attention to the working of our political system.

It is a fact worthy of record that the entire press of Victoria, with one or two insignificant exceptions, is against the Ministry and the Governor; while the papers of the other colonies are unanimous in their condemnation of the men who have used their high position to perpetrate a breach of constitutional government.

All this may prove but a tempest in a teacup to you; but to us it is life or death. It has therefore occupied my space to the exclusion of not a few other matters of interest.

The mail arrangements of the Peninsular and Oriental Company are still of a nature to cause the greatest dissatisfaction. The mails from Europe arrived on the 19th inst., just ten days behind time. Surely, our friends at home will do something to remedy this state of things. It is almost hopeless to expect anything from our present rulers.

Hobart's Bay has recently been visited by numerous shoals of pilchards, which have proved an acceptable article of food, especially as meat is at present fetching so high a price. In Melbourne the fish have been retailed at sixpence the bucketful; in towns one hundred miles inland they command from three halfpence and twopence per pound. Large quantities have been cured. Professor M'Coy pronounces the fish to be the true European pilchard, but the Melbourne zoologists, the great natural habitat of which is Japan. Within the last day or two the pilchards have disappeared.

The Great Britain arrived on the 21st inst., after a fine passage of fifty-seven days from Liverpool.

NEW ZEALAND.

Mr. Fitzgerald has propounded the new native policy; and the Governor has expressed his intention to convene a meeting of the principal chiefs to devise measures of security and improvement for the native race.

THE CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.

The war between the Free State and the Basutos continues. The attempt of the latter to surprise Major Dobbs Bozigo, the Australian colonel of Moshesh, has been so far unsuccessful. Moshesh had large quantities of provisions and gunpowder on the mountain, which was not well invested by the Boers, and he had been enabled by 600 fresh Basutos in one night. The Free State President had returned to Bloemfontein to raise new levies. Fifty men on contract with the Transvaal Boers, who had also levied an army to assist against Moshesh.

The Cape Parliament has been prorogued to Dec. 12.

A Act has been passed to prevent the introduction of the cattle disease into the colony.

The House of Assembly voted a temporary loan of £50,000, to be expended on public works, already sanctioned by the Parliament; but the Legislative Council has refused to the vote.

A vote of £20,000 has been carried for the completion of Kowie harbour.

THE INSURRECTION IN JAMAICA.

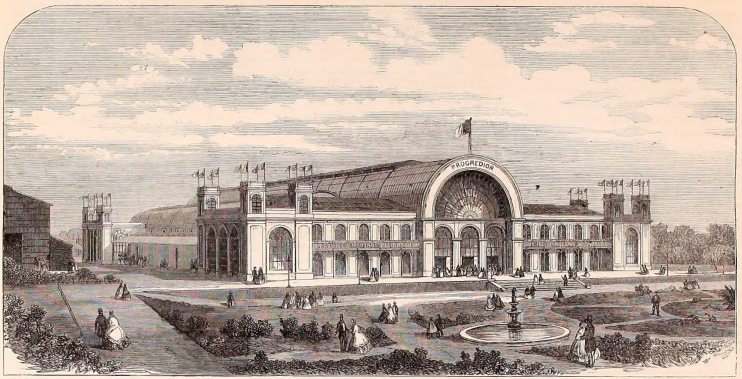
The insurrection in Jamaica seems to have given a short account in a private Number, seems to have been a premature one, and to have been put down with a rapidity which has prevented it from assuming any formidable character. On Christmas Day next. A number of men, some of influence, had been travelling over the country, and had been holding meetings at which secret oaths were taken, telling them they were oppressed and ground down by taxes. This was not the case, as the taxes imposed were very light. The first step was to burn the buildings of the estates, and after killing the males and children, to share the land and women among themselves. A leading man of the party was wanted for some crime, and on an attempt being made to arrest him he raised a revolt. On Monday, 11th inst., numerous members were captured by the rebels, they having in the remote and rude districts almost gone back to the habits of savage life. The bodies of their victims were afterwards found mutilated.

The volunteers and troops fought well, and by vigorous measures put down the rebellion. The insurrection was at first by no means contemptible in its trustworthy; and on one or two plantations the negro labourers took up arms in defence of their employers and families.

More than 300 rebels have been shot or executed. Paul Bogle, the head of the rebel party, was executed on Monday last. He was followed to the gallows, a reward of 1000 dols. having been offered for his head, dead or alive. On the 13th inst. Mr. Gordon, M.P., was tried and condemned to death on the 21st, and hanged on the 23rd. Several arrests have been made in Kingston.

Out of 1500 volunteers who have been under arms, seventeen only have only been prevented from spending, but the rebellion in great measure has been suppressed by the troops, and the leaders, including most of the rebels, have killed or captured.

Five hundred troops had arrived from Barbadoes and gone up to the disturbed districts.



An account of the outbreak is given in the following letter :—

A parish church, Morant Bay, was attacked on Monday, on Oct. 11, and the majority of the respectable inhabitants of the parish were present. This was the time chosen by the rebels to commence the murderous outbreak; and accordingly large numbers of people collected round the Courthouse with every weapon of offence which they could muster. Among the leaders who headed the Riot Act, and, the mob not dispersing, the volunteers fired a volley, which killed one man. The mob immediately fled in all directions, and the militia took up the Courthouse as their quarters. The Custos, with magistrates and volunteers, retired into the Courthouse, and the armed force kept a sharp look-out from the windows. Unfortunately, the police was short, there being only two rounds each. On the shooting down of the leader the mob commenced their murderous attack—cowardly as it was others escaped from the Courthouse, but were seen and pursued. The mob, now re-organised, attacked the Courthouse, surrounded the Courthouse and got the fire-sticks to it in order to drive out or consume the people. Most of the females tried to escape by the windows, but the only one that succeeded at entrance he was butchered by the ruffianly insurgents. The Baron was among the first victims, and was literally hacked to pieces. His head was cut off, and his body cut in pieces, his head was cut in two; his brains were mixed with the dirt and mud of the road. Another victim was Mr. Price, a planter, who was also murdered in the most brutal manner. Mr. Price, merely on account of his association with white people, was subjected to the most appalling indignities. Another victim was Mr. Lord, who had settled in the west land on his fact while the women cut out his bowels and shrewd them on the road. Mr. Lord had his throat cut and his head cut off with a hoe. Georges escaped with two gunshot wounds in his leg. The insurgents also set fire to the Courthouse, and destroyed the magistrates' books, notes, and then, with yelling imprecations and anathemas on the white man and his race, commenced their work of destruction in the town, which they soon perpetrated. The following morning the insurgents pursued their course to two estates, Mr. Price's and Mr. Lord's, where they burned the houses, and after having slain Mr. Price, they began murdering every white man they met, and they came across. All who could not escape met a terrible death. They also proceeded to Mr. Price's estate, where they slew the overseer, but Mr. Paterson miraculously escaped. The troops went from Newcastle to Stony Hill Valley and had an encounter, but never progress in that direction. They report the rebel force as numerous, but little more than armed with cutlasses and bill-hooks. There were four rebels to the other portion of the men took Port Morant and Plantain Garden river and Bath, where the insurgents have reached to within a few miles of Spanish Town. Many of the overseers and bookkeepers have escaped and come to Kingston, and have brought with them their wives and families. The insurgents have also burned the estate houses of Mr. Price, Mr. Lord, and Mr. Georges. Martial law is certainly necessary, and is now in force in the disturbed districts. Shootings and executions have already taken place, and will be carried out to a considerable extent. The Governor has gone to Manchioneal, where the Courthouse and church were burnt down and the negroes mobilised.

THE OPORTO CRYSTAL PALACE.

THE NEW CRYSTAL Palace at Oporto, which has been erected by a private company, was formally opened for the first time during the International Exhibition, on the 18th of September, by their Majesties the King and Queen of Portugal, accompanied by his Majesty's brother, Fernando and the Infante Don Augusto, the father and brother of the King. The Royal family remained a week in Oporto for the purpose of examining the building and its contents; and the occasion of their stay in the city was celebrated by public illuminations and a brilliant series of festivities.

The main building, shown in one of our Engravings, is permanently constructed of granite masonry, iron, and glass, from the designs of the engineer, Mr. F. W. Shields, of Delahay-street, Westminster, and the Infante Don Augusto, the father of the King. Its dimensions are 362 ft. by 238 ft.; and there is a permanent circular gallery 30 ft. wide, and 30 ft. in elevation, as well as large transept, annexes, attached to it. These structures are situated in ornamental gardens of great beauty; and the entire expenditure on the undertaking will amount to £100,000, which, considering that the population of Oporto is but 80,000, is unprecedented in the annals of exhibitions. The credit of this spirited and successful national enterprise is principally due to Mr. Alfredo Allen, of Oporto. The International Exhibition occupies at present every portion of these structures; but, at its close, the permanent establishment will comprise, in addition to the main exhibition building itself, a musical institute, a school of arts and sciences, a picture-gallery, a hippodrome, and a museum.

The buildings comprise a palm-house and conservatory for tropical plants; and the gardens may well be beautiful in a climate where 800 different kinds of camellias are always in flower; where the magnolia covers an area of 50 ft. in diameter; and where a great part of the vegetation of the tropics grows side by side with that of Europe.

The buildings and grounds are situated on the summit of a steep rocky cliff, 300 ft. above the river, and command a view equally rich in historical associations and in romantic and picturesque beauty. To the left, the Serra Convent marks the spot where the famous passage of the Douro was made by the English troops, in 1809, opposite to which the "Rua do Wellesley" perpetuates the memory of the event. The panorama extends from this point, for about five miles along the river, to the Atlantic Ocean, embracing the city itself and a large extent of country around it, where the positions of the besieging army of 1833-5 may be seen. Within the grounds now belonging to the company a chapel (shown in our second Illustration) has been erected, by the Princess de Moutlear, to the memory of her brother Charles Albert, King of Sardinia, who came to Oporto after the disastrous battle of Novara, and ended his days in a residence adjoining this spot.

The interior of the building comprises the central nave, 60 ft. high and 35 ft. wide, and two parallel aisles, each 40 ft. high, and 27 ft. wide, with galleries 14 ft. in width, the rotunda 130 ft. in diameter, and two side annexes, one being used for the refreshments and the other for the machinery department. The Exhibition itself—though it is, of course, not to be compared in importance with those of London, Paris, and Dublin—contains much that is valuable and interesting, and will doubtless be the means of opening the Portuguese market to a great variety of foreign manufactures. The French department is by far the most extensive, the number of French exhibitors being 459; from the German States, Prussia, Saxony, and Bavaria, there are 265. Next comes the English department, with 106 exhibitors, of whom the largest are Messrs. Tucker and Sons, of Arundel-street, London, chandelier and lamp manufacturers—their collection of elaborate and beautiful chandeliers filling the whole of the eastern aisle; while the whole of the eastern annexe is occupied by Messrs. Ransome and Sons, of Ipswich, with a great display of their renowned agricultural implements and machines. A fine organ, by Messrs. Walker, of London, is erected at the south end, and one of the most conspicuous objects in the grounds outside is a powerful centrifugal pump, by Messrs. Gwynne. The show of china and porcelain contributed by the Hill Pottery Company, of Staffordshire, and that of optical instruments by Messrs. Elliott Brothers, are worthy of special notice; and we may also mention, among the English exhibitors, Messrs. Hooper and Co., of the Haymarket, coach-builders; Frodsham and Parkinson, makers of chronometers; Mr. Rimmel, for perfumery; Messrs. Letts and Son, for stationery and presses; Messrs. G. Maw and Co., of Benthall, Broseley, for mosaic; Johnson and Corlett, of Gresham-street, linen manufacturers; Fun Brothers and Co., of Dublin, Irish poplin manufacturers; and Nissen and Parker, London, bank-note printers. There are 1614 Portuguese exhibitors, besides 200 from the Portuguese colonies and 62 from Brazil.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON: SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 18, 1865.

THERE can be no doubt that the option of the great middle class, upon the subject of Parliamentary reform, is that a full and satisfactory inquiry should precede even an announcement of legislation. That class, which has everything to lose by a mismanagement of the question, is perfectly reasonable in regard to an extension of the franchise. It does not urge, selfishly, that the franchise is at present deposited in the keeping of those to whom it can best be trusted, nor does the middle class imitate the example frequently shown by the extremes, and resolve to make fight for its own order. Admitting that not only are there many anomalies which disfigure our representative system, and that there is a large number of persons who may fairly claim the privilege of voting, if privilege it is decided to be, the great educated and intelligent mass is ready to discuss all reasonable proposals. But it refuses to have any questions begged; and it is equally firm in objecting to deal with a great subject in the admitted absence of safe statistics.

Sir Morton Peto, who was chosen for Bristol at the general election, and who has since visited America for the purpose among others, no doubt, of informing himself more fully upon American politics, has just delivered a speech in which the suggestions made by this Journal upon the reform question have been endorsed with singular facility. Sir Morton Peto is an unexceptionable witness on the subject. He is at once a conformist and an advanced Liberal, and he has an intimate acquaintance with the working orders. In adverting, at Bristol, to the probable intentions of the Ministry, Sir Morton professed a thorough confidence in Earl Russell, whose devotion to liberality and progress has been the history of his life. It was, the speaker urged, perfectly safe to leave reform to the keeping of the new Premier. The President was not now in the least likely to belie the promises of so many years spent in his country's service. But Sir Morton declared that he should be best satisfied with a thorough preliminary investigation into the whole question by the Government at the present exists. Like a man of business, he is obviously averse to committing himself to any deductions from imperfect or inaccurate data, and he cannot forget the ludicrously worthless returns which were thrown up by the Reform Commission of 1859. Any legislation the last time that Parliament asked, not very unreasonably, for a sort of conspectus of the borough franchise. Sir Morton Peto appears to think that a Commission would be the most advisable machinery for procuring the information which is desired, and we concur with him in thinking that by this means sounder results would be obtained than by any Parliamentary Committee. We shall be glad to hear that the Cabinet has resolved upon such a course, as really no limit to the class chiefly interested in the settlement of the reform question, but one which that class has a right to dictate; for, while the acquisition of a new franchise may be a legitimate object of ambition to a few, no one can doubt that it is evident that the loss of political power by those who now hold it is a much weightier matter. When we consider that hasty or careless legislation will infallibly disturb all the real interests of society, and that it is really no limit to the class chiefly interested in the settlement of the reform question, but one which that class has a right to dictate; for, while the acquisition of a new franchise may be a legitimate object of ambition to a few, no one can doubt that it is evident that the loss of political power by those who now hold it is a much weightier matter. When we consider that hasty or careless legislation will infallibly disturb all the real interests of society, and that it is really no limit to the mischief which may be wrought to a commercial country by the unwise introduction of fresh influence into the Constitution, it surely behoves the Government in the very first instance to provide for the fairest hearing that can be given. We have hitherto proved themselves loyal supporters of those who have supported every Administration that pursued an onward course, who have patiently borne extraordinary taxation that their poorer fellow-citizens might be exempt, and who certainly stand well in the eye of the nation which is alleged to desire that a transfer of power should take place.

Sir Morton Peto's speech has provoked the anger of those who dwell in exclusive circles, and there is little to be agitation which those classes endeavour to get up has to do with real statesmanship. It is either sheer restlessness or the result of a paltry desire for notoriety on the part of certain insignificant persons. It is not that the country is in a hurry—it is only a section that is in a hurry, lest it should be forgotten while the country is advancing. As Sir Morton Peto observed, it is of no consequence whatever whether a reform bill be passed this year or the next, but it is of the greatest consequence that the bill should be a sound bill. But the eager party cannot see this. Only pull down something and set up something while they are "to the fore," and while they proclaim themselves dissatisfied they will be satisfied. Take time to ascertain exactly what kind of legislation is wanted, and we are told of throwing odd water on the popes of thousands. Now it should be understood that it is not the extreme party who will be allowed to carry any Reform Bill. That will be due to the liberality of moderate men and to the wisdom of the statesmen who represent the thinking of the country.

A word ought to be said also to some who are doing their best to arouse the great middle class against any change whatever, and are thereby doing injury to the Liberal cause, and to the class which must be respected for its laudable ambition to exercise a political influence, though it could be wished that the class in question had clearer views of the object of the franchise itself. But in the mean time, and while so many are unable to see that a vote means neither a right nor a privilege, but is simply a trust, the Government is getting at results, those whose claims are at least as good as anyone else's ought not to be baffled by the ridiculous policy of their so-called friends. At the moment a noisy, if not an influential, section of the extreme party clamours for manhood suffrage. Now, as this is as likely to be conceded as a community of goods, or a law permitting polygamy and polyandry, it is rather a waste of time on the part of those who know this in their hearts to interpose this wild and offensive proposal. It is needless to give a reason why manhood suffrage is simply impossible; the instinct of every rational man will tell him, and if it does not, let him stand for half an hour at any street corner in a low district or join a mob on Lord Mayor's Day. He will then see very clearly why Englishmen will never give political power to a certain class, notwithstanding that they are "born Britons," and are as yet "unconvicted of crime," It is surely needless to pursue this argument; but we would appeal in sincerity to those who are supposed to have influence with the men of extremes, and we would invite them to cause such fanatical folly to be discontinued. We do not know that there is anything so likely to set the middle class against all changes as a conviction that any change is regarded by a large number as means to an end, and that end universal suffrage. We have not real the American story for nothing.

THE COURT.

THE Queen, with the Crown Prince and Crown Princess of Prussia and the Princess Louisa of Prussia, left the royal family mansion at Windsor Castle, in the enjoyment of good health.

On Thursday week the Queen, accompanied by Princess Louisa and attended by the Marchioness of Ely, drove in the vicinity of the castle. About two o'clock the Crown Prince of Prussia, Prince Helena, attended by the Hon. Mrs. Wellesley, Baroness von Schenck, Colonel H. Ponsonby, and Baron de Rabenau, went to London and honoured returning to the castle in the evening. This was the anniversary of the birthday of the Prince of Wales. The bells in St. George's Chapel and St. John's Church were rung at intervals throughout the day. Royal salutes were fired by the Terrible bombardier in the Long Walk, from the Royal Adelaide fregate on Virginia Water, and from the ordnance at Fort Belvedere. In the evening a public dinner took place in the Townhall, and the town was illuminated.

Yesterday week the Queen, accompanied by Princess Louis of Hesse and Princess Helena and attended by Baroness von Schenck and Lord Charles Fitzroy, drove out in a carriage and four, Prince Arthur, attended by Major Elphinstone, G.B., left the castle for Greenwich Park. The Crown Prince and Crown Princess of Prussia arrived at the castle from Sandringham House.

On Saturday last the Queen, accompanied by the Crown Prince and Crown Princess of Prussia, walked in the castle grounds. Later in the day her Majesty, accompanied by Princess Louisa and attended by the Marchioness of Ely, drove out. Princess Louisa of Prussia, Princess Helena, attended by Lady Caroline Barrington and Colonel H. Ponsonby, were also present. On Sunday the Queen, accompanied by the Crown Prince and Crown Princess of Prussia and Princess Louisa, walked and drove in the grounds of the castle. Princess Helena walked and drove. Princess Louisa of Prussia, Princess Helena, Princess Louis, and Princess Beatrice, attended Divine service in the private chapel of the castle. The Very Rev. the Dean of Westminster officiated.

On Monday the Queen, accompanied by the Crown Princess of Prussia and Princess Louisa, drove in the vicinity of the Royal demesne. Princess Louisa, attended by the Hon. Emily Cathcart, walked out. Princess Helena took a drive. The Crown Prince of Prussia, accompanied by the Earl of Mountcharles and the Earl of Caledon and attended by Count Bismarck, Colonel the Hon. C. B. Phipps, and Colonel H. Ponsonby, passed the day shooting. The Lord Chancellor and Lady Cranworth left the castle.

On Tuesday the Queen, accompanied by the Crown Prince and Crown Princess of Prussia and Princess Louisa, walked and drove in the grounds of the castle. Princess Helena walked and drove. Princess Beatrice took a drive. The Crown Prince and Crown Princess of Prussia went to Virginia Water with Queen Marie Amélie. The Prussian Ambassador and Countess Bernstorff arrived at the castle and had the honour of dining with her Majesty.

On Wednesday the Queen, accompanied by the Crown Prince and Crown Princess of Prussia and Princess Beatrice, walked and drove in the castle grounds. Earl Russell had an audience of her Majesty.

Mr. Gubbs has been appointed surgeon at the castle, vice Dr. Locock. Princess Helena, Princess Beatrice, Prince Leopold, and Prince Louis of Hesse, have been practising gunpowder non-explosive and restoring its explosive properties at pleasure.

Lady Churchill has succeeded the Marchioness of Ely as Lady in Waiting to the Queen.

THE PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF WALES.

The Prince and Princess of Wales continue to Sandringham House.

On Tuesday week the Prince, accompanied by the Crown Prince of Prussia, the Duke of Cambridge, the Duke of Devonshire, and Viscount Hamilton, commenced partridge-shooting. The Princess, accompanied by the Princesses of Prussia and the Duchess of Sutherland, drove out.

On Wednesday week the Prince, accompanied by his guests, shot over the Flitcham manor, belonging to the Earl of Leicester, from whom his Royal Highness has obtained the right of shooting over it.

Thursday week was the twenty-fourth anniversary of the birthday of the Prince. The children belonging to Dersingham, Sandringham, Wolferton, and Wootton schools were regaled with tea and beer at Sandringham House. The Prince and Princess, with the Crown Prince and Crown Princess of Prussia, the Duke of Cambridge, and other guests were present. The labourers upon the Sandringham estate received presents from the Prince and Princess in lieu of a dinner. In the evening an immense bonfire was lighted on Sandringham Hill, which illuminated the country round for miles, and lasted for several hours. The Prince and Princess gave a dinner party, at which the following guests, who were staying at Sandringham House, were present:—The Crown Prince and Crown Princess of Prussia, the Duke of Cambridge, the Duke and Duchess of Sutherland, the Earl of Leicester, Count Bismarck, Lord and Lady Fife, the Hon. Mrs. E. Coke, Countess Hohenthal and Count Rudenclaw (Danish ambassador), Count Perponcher (aide-de-camp of Prussia), Colonel the Hon. James Macdonald (in attendance upon the Duke of Cambridge), Colonel Keppel, and Mr. Gruner. After the evening their Royal Highnesses gave a dance, to which the following were invited:—Lieutenant-General, Mrs., and the Misses Knollys; Lord Albert Leveson-Gower, Mr. F. Knollys, Rear-Admiral and Mrs. Seymour and Mr. and Mrs. Ellis, Mr. and Mrs. Nelson and Miss Nelson, the Marquis of Blandford, the Earl and Countess of Effingham and Lady Alice Howard, Captain Milne, R.N., Lady Gosford, Lady Ailsa, Lord Ossington, Miss Sandys; Sir Ivor Guest, Bart.; Captain Stewart, Mr. Cunningham, Mr. and Mrs. C. Coldham; Captain, Mrs., and Miss Campbell; Lieutenant-Colonel Lennard, R.N., Mr. and Mrs. C. W. and Mrs. Bagot, Rev. G. B. and Miss Moxon, Rev. W. and Mrs. Dickinson, Rev. R. B. and Mrs. Schoolcraft, Mr. and Mrs. Jarvis, and Mr. Kendall. Coote and Tinney's band was in attendance. At King's Lynn the bells of St. Margaret's Church were rung at intervals throughout the day, and Royal salutes were fired. In the evening the town was illuminated. In the metropolis the day was kept in the ordinary manner, by the ringing of the bells of the various churches, and in the evening the clubs and the principal shops at the west end were illuminated. About 150 of the Prince's tenantmen celebrated the day by a dinner at St. James's Hall, for which a portion of various wines sent by command of his Royal Highness.

Yesterday week the Crown Prince and Crown Princess of Prussia, attended by Count Bismarck-Schönhausen and Count de Rudenclaw, took leave of the Prince and Princess, and left Sandringham House for Windsor Castle.

On Saturday last Prince and Princess Louis of Hesse, attended by Baroness von Schenck and Baron de Rabenau, arrived at Sandringham House on a visit to the Prince and Princess. The Prince, attended by Major Teesdale, rode to Wolferton station to meet their Royal Highnesses. The Duke of Cambridge, attended by Colonel the Hon. James Macdonald, Viscount Hamilton, and Lord Alfred Paget, left Sandringham House.

Hall, of Seaforth; and the remainder, by Lord Derby. The building will hold 1000 persons, and cost £7000.

A meeting was held, on Monday, at Durham, for the purpose of promoting church extension in connection with the diocese. The Lieutenant of the county, occupied the chair; and contributions amounting to between £800 and £1,000 were announced, including £500 by the Bishop of Durham, the originator of the movement, £200 by the Dean and Chapter of Durham, and £100 by the Dean of Carlisle. Mr. Barnes gave £500 and Mr. W. H. Aycrigg £100.

Ireby Stoke Church is about to be restored, at a cost of nearly £4000, towards which Lord Ashburton has given £500; the Marchioness of Bath and Mrs. Hon. Minna Grosvenor £100 each; and Mr. Hall, of Newport, upwards of £100. The chancel, which is in a very dilapidated condition, will be rebuilt in memory of their wives, by Messrs. Lowndes and Drake, who have also undertaken to restore the stained glass, which was given by Lords Lady Ashburton, in memory of her husband.

The general annual court of the governors of Sherborne Grammar School was held on Wednesday week, at their house, in Sherborne, when it was resolved to take the first step towards the carrying out of the scheme for the re-establishment of the annual festival of the society on May 17 and presented a donation of £50, was unanimously elected a governor of the corporation. Mr. Baker, the registrar, stated that, during the last twelve months, about 200 testimonials applying from various parts of England and Wales—clergymen, their widows, aged single daughters, and children—had been audited by the trustees and committees; and that, although the total amount then distributed was large—about £19,000—yet the sum given to each applicant was small, and often afforded very inadequate relief. The governors present felt very strongly the necessity of strenuous efforts being continued to place the funds of the charity on a sounder basis, and to increase the number of the contributors, and thereby of small bequests and their widows and families. The said testimonials distribute certain bestowals for curates, and in the meantime other instructions will be given by the governors with large families. The governors meet every month to consider pressing cases in any class of persons eligible for grants.

A meeting was held in the Townhall, Liverpool, on Monday, for the purpose of carrying out a scheme proposed by the Rev. Rector Campbell for church and school extension in that town. The meeting was largely attended by clergy and laity. Mr. R. Lowndes, ex-Mayor of Liverpool, was in the chair; and he opened the proceedings in an excellent speech, in which he properly stated the objection of a resolution for forming a society, in connection with the Established Church, for purchasing sites for building churches in Liverpool, and to raise funds for building schools in the poorer and more populous places. The Bishop of Chester seconded the resolution, saying that he would be happy to give it his earnest co-operation. The Rector then entered into the details of the measure, and the resolution was carried unanimously. Mr. Rathbone, M.P., moved the next resolution, which was carried unanimously, to the effect that a committee, to consist of the members of the Town Council, and that a sum amounting to £20,000 had been promised towards the object of the resolution.

On Sunday morning the Dean of Carlisle, in preaching his first sermon as incumbent of the parish of St. Mary, Carlisle, explained the reasons which had led him to accept the living. He had felt that the market in connection with the Cathedral was a serious impediment to the religious best of which he was the head, the more so came to the conclusion that the Cathedral had only one parish, and that the most important church in the city was in the gift of the Dean and Chapter. They were, therefore, in a position to remove what was a blot on the city, for, in morals, in cupidity, and in the sight of God, the Dean and Chapter of every cathedral city had the same duties and liabilities that other people had, and their hands as a sacred trust. He had not presented himself to the living of St. Mary's but has fellow-labourers of the Chapter pressed it to him, because they knew he took it from no worldly motive, but from a desire to do his duty in the sight of God. He was not a man with a church building 400. That had been going for years and years; but there was a new parish, and a population of thirteen thousand souls which would, he believed, enable them satisfactorily to some measure to wipe out the guilt and reproach which the Church of England in Carlisle what she ought to be—taking the lead in every great spiritual work and every moral influence that could exist among men. Therefore his anxiety and great motive in taking this living was that he might, amidst the cares and anxieties incident upon the duties of his diocesan labourer, there should be several ministers.

The following preferments and appointments have recently been made:—The Rev. S. Lysons, Rector of Rodmarton, to be Rural Dean of Cirencester.—The Rev. J. Mayhew, Vicar of Ashton-under-Hill, to be Rural Dean.—Reverend Rev. F. Boyd, Rector of Woodham, Kent, to Helvetti, Bedfordshire.—The Rev. J. "THE BIBLE AND THE MONK—AN INQUISITORIAL VISIT."

THE painter of the picture we engrave on page 485 "made his mark" with a capital little work entitled "The Time and Place," engraved by us from the exhibition at the British Institution in the spring of last year. Since then Mr. Pettie has exhibited several works distinguished, like the present, for dramatic conception of incident and a facile dexterity of handling still more remarkable in a comparatively young and unpractised painter. In this last quality, especially, Mr. Pettie's pictures have resembled those of Mr. Orchardson, a friend and fellow-student, we believe, who rose into public favour about the same time. The visitor to the Winter Exhibition, in Suffolk-street, containing Mr. Pettie's picture, will naturally compare it with the large picture by Mr. Orchardson in the same room, representing the waking scene of Christopher Sly in the lord's bed. And it must in justice be said, that of these two mentorious and rising artists Mr. Pettie makes decidedly the greater advance in solidity and breadth of tone, though not perhaps in colour.

The highly-interesting situation so well imagined and vividly realised in the work now engraved must have been one of common occurrence at the period of the Reformation, and cannot fail to be deeply and variously suggestive to every thoughtful person. It would be beyond our province, however, to attempt to illustrate all the bearings of such a subject as this. The artist's principal aim and meaning are obvious enough. The situation affords scope for representing well-contrasted emotion and three distinct types of character; while—of course assuming that the picture is addressed to a Protestant spectator—the leading intention is to show the irresistible moral and spiritual influences which in all cases of an established prescriptive creed oppose the first feeble efforts of an independent inquiry after truth. The monk is the very impersonation of that spiritual pride and arrogance which too commonly characterise the priestly profession, in all ages and circumstances. Claiming infallibility, consciously or unconsciously, he stands resenting as a personal insult the attempt to defy or escape from his authority; he resents it as a heinous sin; he is prepared to consign to everlasting perdition the tenderest and most innocent of his fellow-creatures if that attempt is persevered in. The enormities of the "Inquisition," so ominously suggested in the title, are but the logical and natural consequences of such a spirit as this. The poor girl, so interesting in her sweet, intelligent beauty and gentleness, must needs quail before the monk's domineering energy; nor can she steel herself to a mother's agonised entreaty; or be insensible to those habitual instincts of submission and reverence proper to her sex. The aged mother—too old to learn, however ignorant—is, of course, only the slave and instrument of the "holy man's" will and pleasure. In representing a young female instead of a man as possessed of the forbidden Bible, the artist has doubtless wished to indicate the all-powerful influence and blind submission which priests everywhere exact over and exact from women, and of which we have all seen or heard such startling revelations.

We would add, in conclusion, that while specially recognising in this picture the inquisitorial spirit of Romanism at the period of the Reformation, it behoves every charitable and candid Protestant to watch well that there may not prove to be—bearing out the proverb that "extremes meet"—a near approach to a parallel between this and some extreme manifestations of Protestant, and in particular of Calvinistic and ultra-Puritanical, intolerance.

"THE GUARDIAN."

WE need not say that the picture, an Engraving of which we give, is powerfully painted, full in effect, and rich in colour: the name of the artist is a sufficient guarantee of technical excellence. The subject of the picture, however, may well excite curiosity and provoke speculation. We naturally form a host of conjectures about the obvious treachery and disobedience of the fair ward, and the exact relation in which "the guardian" stands to her. A French artist would probably have left us in no doubt as to the duped guardian being that incumbrance of the sex (once secured) called a husband, and disparity of age would have been considered a sufficient justification for the basest and unkindest form of deception; whilst a vulgar-minded painter would have sought to heighten the contrast and increase the piquant humour of the situation by rendering the guardian ludicrous and contemptible in appearance. But it is quite evident that Mr. Elmore is meant to be charged with a violation of good taste. It is the old, old story. Love is stronger than fate. The weakest heart depicted is one which dramatist and novelist have often made the pivot, the turning-point for plot or story. Fate had, it would seem, divided this pretty damsel from the lover of her choice. But you might as well set watch and ward to control the laws of gravitation as seek to divide two hearts that have a natural determination towards each other. So, you see, the lady—women being always more fertile in sly ruses, cunning expedients, and wicked tricks than men—contrives that the walk under surveillance shall be a means of communication with her lover and of facilitating ulterior arrangements. Under the very eye of her unsuspecting guardian she shows that she has prepared a billet-doux, written, perhaps, at the "very witching time of night," and only waits a convenient opportunity for transmitting the same. Some one, of course, is on the watch for the all-important announcement thus telegraphed. Some one will follow with the most heedless, purposeless, and objectless air he can assume—quite promiscuously, as Mesdames Malaprop, Gamp, or Brown might say—till, in passing, that note can be taken, or till it may be dropped behind some tree, thrown into some shrub, or left in some pre-arranged hiding-place.

"THE GUARDIAN," BY A. ELMORE, R.A., IN THE WINTER EXHIBITION AT THE FRENCH GALLERY, PALL-MALL.

RESTORATION OF THE CHURCH OF ST. CROSS, WINCHESTER.

WE lately noticed the reopening, by the Bishop of Winchester, of the ancient Church of St. Cross, at Winchester, which has undergone a thorough restoration since the Rev. L. M. Hombert, the present Master of St. Cross Hospital, succeeded the Rev. Earl of Guilford a few years ago. This church, so well known to architects and antiquaries, was commenced in the year 1135 by Henry de Blois, Bishop of Winchester and brother to King Stephen. It is cruciform, with a central tower and lantern; has a lofty clerestory with vaulted stone roofs throughout, and is universally acknowledged to be one of the finest existing specimens of Transition Norman architecture in England. After extensive repairs by John de Campden, the friend of Wykeham, in the fourteenth century, it was in the fifteenth selected by Cardinal Beaufort as the chapel for his new foundation "the Almshouse of Noble Poverty." Although the hospital buildings had been placed in a state of substantial repair, yet at the time of the resignation of the late Master, in 1854-5, the church internally was in a deplorable condition—the walls, piers, Purbeck columns, and stone groined roofs were all coated with whitewash and plaster; the woodwork was painted, and affected with dry-rot; and the pavement, though rich in monumental slabs, brasses, and encaustic tiles, in the most confused, uneven, and miserable state. Under such circumstances, the newly-appointed trustees resolved in 1857 that "the removal of the whitewash and necessary repairs of the church adapted to the character of the building should form one of the earliest subjects to which the attention of an architect should be directed." In the following January Mr. Butterfield was appointed architect to the hospital. After several delays, owing to the want of funds, work was fairly commenced, an unknown benefactor, Z. O., having given £500 for the repairs of the choir and east end of the church; while the master, by persevering exertions, has raised among his friends and neighbours, with the encouragement and support of the Bishop, a sum sufficient to include the transepts, choir-aisles, and lantern. This general restoration of the building, although not complete, has rendered the building fit for the purposes of worship, and on every a fair notion of its former appearance. The contract for the stonework has been carried out by Messrs. Newman and Son, Winchester; the Brothers' stalls and fittings are by Stedly, of London. The new tiles are by Minton. The six principal windows at the east end are set by Wailes, and represent the Annunciation, Nativity, Epiphany, Resurrection, Ascension, and the Descent of the Holy Ghost. Two windows, by Alexander Gibbs, in the north transept, represent the Healing of the Impotent Man at Bethesda and the Agony at Gethsemane. The polychrome enrichments at the east end are so far as they go at present, the gift of Mr. Melville Portal, from designs by Mr. Butterfield, executed by Mr. Fisher, of London. The capitals, where painted, have a background of red colour, the foliage being partially gilt. The upper fillet of the abacus is deep red, the lower alternately blue and yellow, under this pale bluish slate, then another line of white. The prevailing colours are blue and red, the former predominating, the latter colour; bluish grey, somewhat resembling Portback marble; pale subdued green, with a very small quantity of black and white. The whole reredos work of the windows is partly painted salmon-colour and grey. The lines of the springing of the arches are painted white, on a dark blue ground; and the bosses of the roof of the nave retain traces of the ancient painting. The cross between the windows is of white marble, inserted in the background of Sicilian marble. The shafts and colonnettes are, in some instances, painted the above colours on the raised stone; in the others a black composition is filled into incised fillets. The altar-railing and lectern are executed by Messrs. Hart and Son, from Mr. Butterfield's designs. The latter is of wrought iron, painted black and picked out with gold—the gift of Major South; the latter, an eagle—gift of work in brass, is the gift of Mrs. Wadmore.

The church, though small in dimensions—being internally 124 ft. in length from east to west, 110 ft. from the western entrance, and 57 ft. high to the vaulting, which is stone-grooined throughout—is quite a little cathedral in its plan and appearance, and when fully restored, will be one of the most complete works of its kind that we have. Our illustration is from a photograph by Mr. Savage, of Winchester, who devotes all the profits of the sale of his photographs to the fund for proving nd a new pulpit.

FINE ARTS.

AN "exhibition of water-colour drawings," proposed to be erected annually, has lately been opened at the Hall of Commerce, in the Scandinavian Gallery. Although the larger proportion of the present contents of the gallery has not before been submitted to public view, the drawings are not the direct contributions of the artists themselves, but have been collected for exhibition and sale by Mr. M'Lean, the well-known print and print publisher. Many of the drawings, though not extensive, is sufficiently fresh, choice, and varied to claim notice and speak a visit.

The love of water-colour art must always welcome—if only to renew acquaintance—the works of some of the old masters, and none are the more welcome are they when they can be compared with the latest productions of the present day. In the present case, we shall be content to find here examples of such deceased painters as David Cox, Copley Fielding, and W. Hunt, the first is illustrated most variously of the three—when his manipulation was most broad, simple, and comparatively complete; when, later, it was more simply indecisive, and at the same time more positive and pronounced; and, finally, it had apparently become quite slovenly, a most default "interesting" or "sugar-piper," yet it was not without a certain suggestive. The most delicate and graceful, if artificial, part of Copley Fielding's style is that of power in pleasing, and of a loving drawing of "Sweet Downs." Nor, in our too violent reaction from classical excitement, must we ignore the beauty of wrought iron, even in arrangements in Barrett's "Composition." In announcing, with little or no comment, that the following well-known artists are represented in fair average specimens as we shall, we trust, have shown, the value of what can be expected by the reader till the time arrives for viewing impressions at the retiring rooms, viz.:—Hunt, "Scene, Bolton Abbey;" Cox, "View of S. Giovanni, Rome," a large, powerful, and good example), J. Holland (a "Scene," perhaps a finer work than any of the three—which last two, especially the last few years), E. Duncan (a capital storm-piece), Carl Haag, J. Gilbert ("Landscape Golcho and the Pyrenees"), Lance (a drawing "Gil Blas"), E. Warren ("Spring," one of the attractions of the last exhibition of the Institute), W. Leighton, Absolon, and other water-colour drawings, of which the best are the quietest in tone—see No. 108—and least loaded with the paint of the painter. The "Sketches," by G. Catmoche, we shall engrave. There are drawings also by some of the last-elected members of the two societies in Pall-mall, of which we may mention "A Roadside Quarrel," by Frank Stone, vigorous, but heavy and horry in tone; a broom basin, reading with much delicacy, by "A Lover of Art;" "A View in Canterbury Cathedral Bridge," by A. Hunt—too broken and uniformly glittering in effect; and "A Fishing Passenger," by F. Walker, a sketch of a boy with his two bens marching into a farmyard, small various manifestations of feet, vegetation, and perhaps from the same hand, a drawing of very unequal in merit.

In the General Exhibition of Water-Colour Drawings at the Egyptian Hall everyone was surprised at the large amount of previously almost unknown talent; and this must be the case—so greatly has an appreciation and encouragement of water-colour been increased, and so exclusive are the old-established societies—in every successful exhibition. It must not, however, be supposed that a collection such as this, formed to meet a demand which is too generally met for existing wants, is much at once among the best, though standing a few meritorious drawings here, by comparatively little-known artists—as, for instance, H. T. Dawson, whose reputation for its rich autumnal colour; "Meditation," by J. D. Linton (son of the engraver), distinguished by tender feeling; "Early Spring Day," an excellent drawing, in the style of Duncan—the framing says, the artist is one of "dirty" clouds, and the Dutch boats are very truthfully rendered; a pretty young girl, with her milking-pail, by G. Kilburne; and "The Park," by W. F. Stocks. We conclude with two or three drawings by artists better known to the public generally, "The Tomb of Dante," by F. Dillon, "The Harvest-field," by C. Bentley—very true to nature, and tender in its "sentiment" of hardness; and clever reproductions, in water-colour, by Marcus Stone, of two of his illustrations to "Our Mutual Friend."

Agreeably to our proposition last week, we recur to the exhibition of Mrs. Cameron's photographs, open (free of charge) during the present season, in a room over the Printing Office, 4, Fleet-street. We do so in order to mention a few of the recent successes of that most artistic of photographers: our estimate of the majority of the collection we have already described. She addresses herself sometimes to portrait, also studies and compositions which have something of the new relation to art which Daguerreotypes pour servir have to nature. Of these of the first, we may select for especial commendation a portrait of Mr. G. F. Watts, the painter—a large and very successful picture, though the highest light is perhaps too far up on the temporal bone; a capital presentment of the head itself of "Tom" Hughes, the author of the popular book "Tom Brown's School Days;" a new profile of Tennyson—though we could wish for a somewhat smaller proportion of the head of our great poet; and several portraits of young ladies of various types of face and natural beauty, lovelinesses, or, at all events, of various modes of expression which we suspect ordinary male photographers would fail to see in the by-the-way Mrs. Cameron's own compositions let choice of female models for her fancy subjects. "However, one particular model—invaluable in many subjects, and especially where an expression is required of gentle dignity and sweetness—is represented so often as to greatly detract from the variety one expects in so large a collection. Of the new single-figure subjects, we may mention a large profile of the model just alluded to, together with "Astarte," "Il Penseroso," "A Vestal," a full-length of a nude sleeping infant, and a "character portrait" of Honry Taylor, the poet—worthy, as the title imports, to impersonate "King David," and, like the sleeping infant—nay, like all Mrs. Cameron's photographs, of peculiar value to an artist for its suggestiveness. Among the new compositions let two or more figures there are noteworthy repetitions of the "motive" of a mother scooping lovingly over her sleeping babe, and also three photographs which must rank among Mrs. Cameron's most remarkable achievements. These are respectively described as "Prospero and Miranda," "Queen Esther [as a fainting supplicant] before Ahasuerus," and "Friar Lawrence and Juliet:" and in all three the representations of the male character is fine. Henry Taylor, whose head, perhaps we may be permitted under the circumstances to observe, is precisely what either artist or photographer could desire in a model of all that is admirable in and should dignify advancing years. Of these three photographs the "Esther and Ahasuerus" is most successful dramatically. The "Prospero and Miranda," however, deserves praise for the manner in which it lends itself exactly to express the pensive yet gracious majesty proper in the princely banished magician; whilst the maiden impersonating Miranda, who looks bella him with timidly-affectionate questioning eyes, plays her part with most engaging and charmingly unconscious sweetness.

The private view of the Winter Exhibition of Sketches and Studies of the Society of Painters in Water-Colours took place on Saturday last, since on Saturday next, the exhibition will be open to the public on the Monday following. The Society of Female Artists will, we hear, soon move into more extensive rooms than those in which will be held in the Gallery of the Institute of British Architects, Conduit-street, and of which we shall speak in our next week's text. All works intended for exhibition must be sent to this gallery on the 1st or 2nd of December.

Gibson's original tinted statue of Venus (of which several copies have been made), was exhibited by her Mrs. H. Hertslet, and sent by him to the International Exhibition of 1862. Recently it has been placed in the new residence of that gentleman's widow, Richmond-hill, where visitors are kindly permitted to see it on personal application.

THE PANIC.

THE first Report of the Bankruptcy Commissioners has appeared at last. It begins by stating that the disease broke out in Islington, Hackney, and Lambeth, and was traceable in all three instances to cows bought in the metropolitan market on June 19; and on the 20th, 21st, and 22nd extended into twenty-one English counties, two Welsh, and sixteen Scotch, and was attributed by the Commissioners to the worst cattle plague in history, and the attempts made to arrest them, the Commissioners reported certain suggestions. As they feel what an amount of opposition their proposed to suspend for a limited time the removal of store cattle from one district to another, and to empower the police to modify it by a series of alternative suggestions, which may be found unobjectionable, and to which the Commissioners have given much intelligence most formidably. One of the best is their protest against the fifteen years' monopoly of the mine and destroy, as it proportion to the disease spreads, "the inevitable result of the cessation of the means of multiple becomes insupportable." They evidently consider that while the Commissioners' Report is not to be regarded as a complete history of great State bill is being equitably incurred, and, in fact, they say as much. The Report, however, has been received with general favour. Allow no grieving on commons or unenclosed lands, and adopt the precautions already carried out in Great Britain at 1,000,000, exactly one per day has died for every 116,000, and that 166 sound cattle have been imported for every one that has died, a proportion of one in a thousand of these. He also gives several other reasons why no further restrictions are desirable.

Many farmers will be disposed to believe that the professional panic-mongers and the butchers (who have driven materfamilias nearly to despair by their exorbitant charges) have had a hand in this, and that many cases of common disease get into the returns. The reverse report produces a fall in the price of meat, which is very distressing to that a cowherd or a shepherd should give an opinion, or, in fact, anywhere to entrust to anyone but a veterinary surgeon. The Report of last week cannot be set aside by mere professional jealousy, as the Commissioners are not veterinary surgeons themselves, but however "amusing" it may appear, the other side should have a fair trial with the greatest impartiality and fairness.

Birmingham has decided to hold its cattle show on Dec. 2-5.

Mr. Hugh Hall, the well-known jockey, who has for invariably served both in England and Scotland, died on Friday last, at his residence, The Den, near Perth. He quitted Kelder about five years ago, and since then, in 1849 was appointed to the superintendence of the lungs brought on by neglected bronchitis. His last public appearance was at Ascot, in 1849, when he rode Mr. Merry's Bloomsbury, and recorded him as the champion breeder of the Angus cattle. His own favourite breed was the Ayrshire, and in which he was virtually retired from the show ring, he won about 200 prizes in the United Kingdom. Mr. Hall was born at Kelder, in the year 1800, and was, perhaps, hardly an equal. His Scoubdown and Leicester flocks were equally good; but it was not in the former breed that he stove to build up the best Warisby models. He was especially prided himself, and his blood is to be found in every Scotch flock of any repute. His Cheviot Shepherd, Tait, or Grey-breasted Jock, who was a large sweepstakes when he was thirteen years old, and in 1829 was a two-year-old, when he walked eighteen miles to a show and won. The heifer with which he won at Birmingham in 1839 was sold, at her owner's own request, she was modelled for a medal. He was about seventy-eight years of age. Mr. Hall was the brother of the late Mr. Hall, of Dunlop, so that weary illness which many thought would have carried him off for many years. Mr. Hall, of Dunlop, Agriculturist, Scotland never produced a greater master of his profession, or one who formed more extensive connections in every part of the two countries. He was also rather fond of racing in his day, and won some smaller cups with Scotch trained horses. He was one of the Hirtrees proprietors, and was also his friend Captain Barclay he turned it for a couple of stages, between Cupar Angus and Perth in 1832, and was one of the original Caledonian Coach proprietors. Mr. Lafferty he was a good deal connected with railways, and acted as land valuer to the Caledonian, and in his distinguished career he made of his going out.

The Duchess of Ulverston, also died on the same day, in his fifty-fifth year. In his quiet way, no one loved a shortshorn more deeply than he did. Mr. Hugh Watson, as he was called by the late Captain Spencer won the head old-bull prize, a few years since, at the Royal Show. The Spencer did not carry any of his best at the Royal; but, like Mr. Hugh Watson, he was one of the judges at Battersea, in 1852.

The annual dinner of the Prince of Wales Yacht Club was held on Saturday last at the Freemasons' Tavern. The party was presided over by the Vice-Commodore, Mr. Cecil Leog.

The general hill of fare at the banquet given on Thursday last by the Lord Mayor to the Ministers of State was of the usual kind. There were 200 turreens of real turtle, containing five pints each, 100 bottles of hock, 100 of sherry, 100 of champagne, 100 of claret, 100 of port, 100 of madeira, 60 calves' heads, 60 dishes of mock turtle, 60 dishes of pigeon pies, 60 hams encumbered, 40 tongues, 2 quarters of horse lamb, 2 barons of beef, 2 rounds of ditto, 2 saddles of mutton, 12 sirloins of beef, 6 rumps of beef, 60 dishes of mashed and other potatoes, 44 dishes of shellfish, 4 dishes of lobsters, 140 dishes of fish, 60 dishes of game, 40 dishes of ducks, 40 dishes of stewed pastry, 30 dishes of orange and other "tosters," 20 Chantilly baskets, 20 dishes of minced collops, 20 made. The remains of 80 turkeys, 6 turkeys, 10 pheasants, 24 geese, 40 dishes of partridges, 15 dishes of wild fowl, 2 pea fowls. Dessert: 100 pineapples, from 2 lb. to 8 lb. each; 200 dishes of hothouse grapes, 200 icecreams, 60 dishes of apples, 100 dishes of pears, 60 ornamental fancy dishes, 60 dishes of preserved fruits, 60 dishes of jellies, 60 dishes of blancmange, 60 dishes of cheese, 40 dishes of rout cakes and chips, 40 dishes of bready cheesecakes. The wines drunk on the occasion were of six kinds—hock, champagne, claret, madeira, port, and sherry. Except as to one or two rare dishes, all the company, wherever they sat and whatever their rank or degree, were served with the same fare. Thus, the grandees at the chief table had seven removes, the guests at the five upper tables had six, and so on, the luxuries of this class becoming small by degrees. To the number of dessert the guests appear all to have been on an equality, and of that they had eleven separate luxuries. There were about 1000 guests.

ECHOES OF THE WEEK.

At the bottom of this horrible black business in Jamaica, with its worse than sepoy-like atrocities and its utter indefensibility—for provocation to revolt was wholly wanting—there may lurk, unsuspected save by a very few, a predisposing cause, an element of savagery and fanaticism, as powerful for evil in its way as the "Deus, Deus Ju!" or faith-cry of the Mohammedan, and the vegetarian superstitions of the Hindoos. In one of the accounts of the Jamaica massacre Bay I read that "several cases of ground cartridges" were reported as reasons for dissaffection among the blacks." This is their reason, then. The negro has a religious antipathy neither for the fat of hogs, nor sheep, nor cows. He is much nearer a heathen than a vegetarian.

What, then, is this mysterious profligossing cause, this element of evil? I am afraid that, when I mention it, I shall not be adding appreciably to the general stock of knowledge. It is "Vaudouism." I do not know whether I am spelling this word correctly. The infernal mystery of the "Vaudoux" is known to the initiate of gruesome, but it is "Vaudouism." It may be best described as "Obeah" disguised under a veil of fetticism and mummery. The Parliamentary Papers on the abolition of slavery between 1812 and 1838 will tell you all about Obeah; how, in certain cases, the malefactor deity was propitiated by hanging a negro woman up by the heels in her thumbs and heels, and to death with tamarind-bushes; and how, in others, the sacrificial rites were not completed without libations from the skull of a new-born baby filled with rum and blood. These are no gobemouche stories. You will find them in the Reports of the Select Committee on the Obeahism prosecuted, by the Sovereign's command, to both Houses of Parliament.

With slavery the overt practice of Obeah disappeared from the British West Indies, but it has since undergone change in the hands together in large bodies; they became more or less isolated negroisms, and refers about the cities, where it was difficult and dangerous to practice the horrid incantations of the sect. The old slaveowners, who had been the chief possessors of its mysteries, faded away. But an Obeah did not call Vaudouism crop in. Some say it was imported from Hayti, and that Faustin Soulouque was a noted Vaudou; others that it came from the Congo country. I have been told by a lady of New Orleans that nothing was more common in families than to find black Vaudou servants among the best, and much attention was paid to their vagaries on this head, and Americans coming to Louisiana from the south were accustomed to look upon Vaudou as a kind of mild superstition. The creoles, however, have never ceased to dread it as something unfathomably horrible. Even among the blacks themselves, to be suspected of Vaudouism was to be held in bad odour—to be sure or sold—well. In that same Hayti, of which I spoke anon, and in the course of a few years, twelve months ruled over one area and a woman were guillotined for Vaudouism. They had kidnapped a young girl, murdered her, and eaten her heart. Such is the Vaudou's deity. This very summer, too, I was enabled to witness among the Creoles of Cuba a case of the trial of Vaudouism. In Puerto Africa, however, the rites do not go beyond the sable devotees munching the carcass of the goat sacrificed to their patron deity, and, now and then cutting the throat of an old hen or knocking a worn-out cow on the head.

Depend upon it, the Vaudou has something to do with the uprising of the blacks in Jamaica. Its most perilous feature is, that no white man can tell when the Vaudou fanaticism really is. A Vaudou may appear a perfectly peaceable black man. He may send his children to Sunday School, and be a regular attendant at Methodist chapel; but every now and then the elders foot of the rite will come over him. Then it means slaying at some thing. Rum and gunpowder is a cocoanut-shell to begin with; next human blood is the appropriate holiday libation. The spirit of "Achilles" in the New York Daily News, and that, unfortunately, is the only white man I know who does think we should have rather better off for information had we possessed in the British West India a few of those Yankee "Rangers" whom the Sydney Herald sent as "Iova Fa Preston" and the "mates of journalism"? As it happens, the London papers have professional correspondents in the Antilles; and the intelligence we receive by the West India mail is generally made up in the most slovenly manner for English readers. At this, I will but say that the British invidious host of "Bull-dog" strive "to speak for itself."

It is difficult to believe that the French "Board of Index"—I never hear there was such a body—have refused the licensing stamp to a French translation of "Uncle Tom's Cabin." Yellowplush thinks, on the ground that they contained "attacks upon the English aristocracy of such acerbity that the Government of France might lead to consequences from the British Government." Goodness gracious! Why, the "attacks" in question have been translated into French years ago; but I never heard that Lord Cowley had been instructed to remonstrate with the Government of the day on the subject. Certainly, the aristocracy get harder measure than they do in Yellowplush.

Poor Mrs. Gaskell! With what melancholy frequency lately has the passing away of her friends been gifted among us been alluded to in those too narrow words, "Sudden Death!" Whom the gods love die young, and the fates are kind to those under tale of Sylvia's Lovers" had an unconfortable and disagreeable plot, but was, nevertheless, marked by great vigour and occasional felicity of expression. "Memoir of Charlotte Bronte," it would have been as well, perhaps, had Mrs. Gaskell not written. Nor she—not even Miss Martineau, it may be—could understand that strange, wild, fantastic little Yorkshire parsonage-daughter. Currer Bell's life should be written by a real character had she written her life; but even George Eliot would have failed to understand Charlotte Bronte.

Admirably at home in calm, quiet pictures of English domestic life, alternately cheerful and pathetic, Mrs. Gaskell could not, in a large sense, stirringly melodramatic and vastly humorous; as witness some of her minor tales and contributions contributed to Household Words. It may be—could understand that strange, wild, fantastic little Yorkshire parsonage-daughter. Currer Bell's life should be written by a real character had she written her life; but even George Eliot would have failed to understand Charlotte Bronte.

about that fearsome swine—for argue we—in "The Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border." Of the Dragon of Wantley and the Lernian Hydra you have heard, of course? Well, in the neighbourhood of Harrogate, and to the infinite joy of the sheep-farmers of the country side, was slain, this day week, a ferocious beast partaking of the nature of all the pests I have just spoken of. He is described as a cross between a dog and a wolf, and as such was brought down to Harrogate and exhibited in a menagerie. The brute managed to escape, and for months he has been wandering up hill and down dale worrying sheep. He never ate his victims. Oh, no! a true vampire he, he merely fastened his teeth in their throats and sucked their blood. On this unearthly diet he grew prodigiously fat. Last Friday he was hunted down and slain; and guns were fired and a flag hoisted on a high hill by gentlemen who had assisted in the hunt, as intimation was no more. In another age, ballads would have been made on the deed—ballads of incredible legends related about the Devil-Wolf of Harrogate.

THE FENIANS.

BETHESDA, the Fenian Head Centre in Ireland, has been arrested. He was captured, says Dickinson, D'Arcy, and Devoy, in a house in Dublin, in which arms had been taken, under the name of Herbert, in the autumn of last year. Bethesda is described as a "big, fat, pompous man," and is well supplied with all the necessaries of life. Two prisoners were brought up at the police court in the course of the day and remanded, Stephens contentiously declaring that he would not engage any attorney in the matter. Stephens and his companions were re-examined on Tuesday and Wednesday. Evidence was given of a conspiracy to levy war, of a secret organisation, and it was shown by documents found in Stephens's house that he had been in communication with the prisoners already committed for trial, through the medium of an attorney named Nolan; and, in the course of the day, Mr. Nolan was arrested. Mr. Stephens, it was stated, had left Ireland, and had been seen in Dublin by the British Consul in New York, proved that certain documents found in Stephens's house were in the handwriting of John O'Mahony, the head of the Fenians in America. At the conclusion of the evidence the magistrate asked the prisoners if they wished to say anything. Stephens said he did not intend to enter upon his audience, because in making a plea or defence of any kind he should be recognising British law, and he did not recognise it. Stephens then read aloud the right or even the existence of British law in Ireland. He doted and declared any punishment that could be inflicted upon him would be most merely wished to deny a report in the newspapers that he had absconded. The other prisoners intimated that they would follow Mr. Stephens's lead. All fully committed for trial at the special commission on the 27th inst.

Mr. Stephens has left Ireland, and it is generally believed that he left because he thought it was time to go. He has gone to France, there is a strong suspicion that he has not left Ireland.

Yesterday week the Dublin police court was crowded to suffocation to hear again at the motion by the Attorney-General that the proceedings against the Lord Lieutenant should be stayed. Mr. Sullivan, in a long speech, argued that the action of the Lord Lieutenant was the action of the State, and therefore not to be impeached in the Queen's Bench. Mr. Whiteside made an able speech in the hearing is worth notice. One of the counsel for Luby, the Fenian printer, is Mr. Whiteside's son-in-law, and the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Addis Emmet. The reference was loudly cheered by a part of the audience, who thought the Chief Justice was not impartial while Mr. Justice Hayes told they were not, and would have granted a conditional order in reference to the police reports alone.

The objective Hughes and Doyle, who were convicted of Stephens and the other Fenian arrests, were shot at, on Sunday evening, while they were entering the police office in Kilmainham. Hughes was wounded, and was struck by a ball in the shoulder and Doyle was wounded near the spine. The shots were supposed to have been fired from a house on the road, which was occupied by Hopper, the tailor, who is in custody on the charge of Fenianism. It has been decided to term the attempt to murder Hughes and Doyle blowing the men, it appears, having applied to the Government for revolvers, "for the purpose of protecting themselves against Fenians."

The London letter-carriers have started a movement for increased wages on account of the high prices of provisions.

A notice has been issued by the Metropolitan Board of Works in reference to the traffic, by locomotive engines, through the metropolis, within the jurisdiction of the Metropolitan Board of Works. The notice states, in anticipation, that, in consequence of the great improvement made in steamboats, there will be an increased amount of traffic with them on common roads; that between the hours of six a.m. and ten p.m. no locomotive engine, with or without carriages, can be permitted to pass the limits of the jurisdiction of the said board at a greater speed than nine miles an hour." The notice makes an exception in favour of a tire-engine "proceeding by steam going to or returning from a fire." It also states that, with the exception of three hours, locomotives may pass along the streets and places within the jurisdiction of the board at all hours.

The session of the Society of Arts for 1863 was opened on Wednesday, at the Society's House in the Adelphi, by Mr. Cubitt, president of the council, who delivered the inaugural address. Mr. Hawes first noticed the Society's losses by death during the past year. Of Mr. Charles Wentworth Dilke, Mr. Gregson, M.P., David Roberts, R.A., John Fowler, inventor of the steam-plough, Mr. Jones, and Mr. Agnew, had all been members of the council. Mr. Cubitt, Mr. Thos. Winsloworth, one of the oldest members of the society, and with whom had originated the idea of the Exhibition of Arts and Manufactures "of all nations;" and lastly, Dr. Lindley, the distinguished botanist. During the year the various committees had been actively employed, and had made considerable progress, and a good deal had been done in the way of sanitary reform, and in the improvement of the dwellings of the industrial classes. The Society was very successful in its commercial negotiations with foreign powers which had been read during the past session, and also gave an analysis of one read by Mr. Scott, secretary to the Society of Arts, in reference to Continental Exhibitions which appeared among our exhibitions in 1749-70, on the methods of preventing infection, and on the medicinal treatment of lunatics seized with it." An effort had been made during the year to induce the wealthy City companies to give prizes for industrial works of art, but none had responded except the Solders' and Plasterers' Companies. Having noticed the great metropolitan works now in progress, Mr. Hawes next proceeded to announce that a hall of arts was about to be erected at the north end of the Thames Embankment, to be called the Albert Memorial Hall of Arts. The estimate for the building was £200,000, and the Prince of Wales would be president of the provisional committee. The permanent governing body would be authorised by Royal charter. In conclusion, Mr. Hawes called attention to the portraits of the Queen, Prince Consort, and family, as they appeared at the Exhibition of 1851. The address was loudly cheered.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

At a meeting of the City Commissioners of Sewers, on Wednesday, Dr. Letheby reported that the markets and slaughter-houses had been carefully inspected, and the latter had contained 13 cattle, most of them for human food, consisting of seventeen sheep, three calves, and one pig, and that he had condemned 1 cwt. of meat. Most of it was diseased, and 6 lbs. of it was from animals which had died from natural causes.

A complimentary dinner was given, on Thursday week, to Mr. Joseph Andrew Horsley, at the new premises provided over by Lord Burghley, Harley-street, for the service of plate and jewels, of the value of 800 guineas, was presented to Mr. Horsley by the clerks of the several parishes and unions, and fees in the metropolis, and by the parishes' and institutions, serving non-clubs, and other means of social improvement.

A meeting of the Court of Aldermen was held on Tuesday, when Aldermen Phillips, the Lord Mayor elect, Sir Robert Carden, and Sir John Shaw were elected to fill the brother aldermen for the honour they had done him, and requesting him to allow himself to be nominated. A vote of thanks to Mr. Alderman Sir William Lewis, Lord Mayor, was moved by Mr. Alderman Copeland, seconded by Mr. Alderman Dakin, and unanimously agreed to.

At the first meeting, on Monday night, of the Royal Society of Architects, under the presidency of Mr. B. W. Baker, who has made a considerable addition to the number of members, a paper was read by Mr. Lewis Vulliamy, on the Ancient Obelisk and Modern Pedestal erected before the White Side Screw, and which he names Albert Nyanza, read a speech of the architect. His account of the difficulties was interesting and curious and completes the discovery of Speke and Grant.

The Commissioners of her Majesty's Works and Public Buildings have issued their plans for the extension of the National Gallery (Sainsbury's) and the formation of a National Portrait Gallery. It is proposed to be taken is at the back of the gallery on the north side of Trafalgar-square, and to be approached through the present gallery, or by a place on the east, by Duke's-court on the south, and by Castle-street on the west. It is proposed to erect a building somewhat in the form of the letter H, with Archbishop Tenison's Grammar School, which stands on the site.

On Tuesday week the Lord Mayor, Monday, Vice-Chancellor Sir Page Wood, the Lady Mayoress, with their daughter, and the Sheriffs of London, with their wives, visited the Crystal Palace, Sydenham, by invitation of the Company of Gardeners, to witness the annual exhibition of flowers and fruits there, in aid of a fund for poor and aged members of the company, and widows of deceased freemen. The Corporation lent the society the hall for the purpose, with the state carriages and servants in attendance. The show remained open to the public during Wednesday and Thursday, at a charge of 5s. for each day. The hall was filled with fruit, and also at the banquet on Lord Mayor's Day, and, with the show of flowers, plants, and fruit, in the gallery, the display was considered very successful.

The nomination of Sheriffs took place in the Court of Exchequer, on Monday, in the presence of the Lord Chief Baron, assisted by the full court of Judges. In the absence of the Lord Chancellor, Earl Granville, Sir Hugh Cairns, and Lord Westbury, who were engaged in the House of Lords, the Lord Chief Baron, with some special exceptions, these names are submitted to each of the Judges in turn, and one is selected for the ensuing year. The usual mode of doing so is to take the first on the list, the second, and the third, and so on, but the Lord Chief Baron has the power to select any one he pleases. The Lord Mayor elect, Mayor Phillips, in the absence of the intention of Government to call him to the not very onerous duties of Sheriff, and he was accordingly sworn in as Sheriff of London and Middlesex, adding new men to the list. The meeting for picking takes place in January.

The inquest on the victims of the gas explosion at Nine Elms terminated (as stated in a good portion of the impression of our last number) in a verdict of accidental death. The jury added to their verdict a censure on the manager of gas from what is technically called a "governor" at the entrance of the gas into the purifying apparatus, in a position where it was liable to explode. The gas is distributed through the mains by means of what are designated "governors," which are for the purpose of regulating the pressure of the gas, and regulate the pressure of the gas upon the main pipes. Some of the men, including that which was the cause of the explosion, were called "governors," and this had no effect the opposite of that which was intended, causing the pressure of the gas to be greater than the mains could resist. It is supposed that the original injury to the "governor" was occasioned by the workmen using a hammer to it. The jury, in addition to their verdict, added a recommendation that the "governors" should in future be placed outside the retort-house, and not underneath, as at present they have been found to be.

The prizes and certificates obtained by the members of the Mechanics' Institute, Southampton-buildings, at the last examination of the Society of Arts, were distributed on Tuesday evening, by Mr. Lowe, member for Sheffield in the chair. The twelve candidates who passed the examination in the first class were presented with certificates of merit, and a number of Arts, and twenty-four candidates were first class, second class, second, and four third. During the last six years, only one candidate who passed the examination in the first class failed to obtain a prize or certificate of merit. It is supposed that the original injury to the "governor" was occasioned by their using a hammer to it. The jury, in addition to their verdict, added to their verdict thick has been victorious over steel. The second experiment was conducted at Genoa by the Italian Government. The plate was subjected to twelve rounds from a 68-pounder at the extraordinary small range of 13 yards, after which merciless attack it did not show a single crack or fissure, and was considered by all competent judges to be the best result ever obtained.

On the conclusion of the ceremony the visitors adjourned to the spacious dining-hall attached to the works and partook of an excellent luncheon, which the Millwall Company had provided. Sir J. Hay, who occupied the chair, after giving the toast of "The Queen," gave that of "The King of Italy," which was drunk amidst loud cheering. Baron Marochetti, in returning thanks, expressed his deep regret that the Marquis d'Azeglio, the Italian Minister in this country, was obliged to be absent on account of illness, and read a letter from that nobleman, in which he alluded to the necessity there was for the establishment of a powerful Italian navy, and intimated that it was the intention of the Italian Government to proceed as rapidly in that direction as the state of their finances would permit. He expressed the gratification of the Italian Government at the manner in which the Millwall Company had executed their contract in the construction of the Affondatore, which was a magnificent addition to the Italian navy, and concluded by acknowledging the obligations which the kingdom of Italy was under to the British people, and especially for the cordial sympathy they had always shown to the people of Italy when struggling for national liberty.

THE LATE WILLIAM VINCENT WALLACE.

THIS lamented musician was a native of Ireland. He was born at Waterford, on the 1st of June, 1814. His father was bandmaster of the 29th Regiment of the Line—an excellent performer on several instruments—by whose instructions the youth profited so well that, before he was fifteen, he was appointed organist of Thurles Cathedral. He was born with an irresistible propensity for travelling, which he indulged in after life by rambling over almost every quarter of the world. He began his wanderings at the age of eighteen, when he emigrated to New South Wales, whence he went to Tasmania and New Zealand; from which last place he embarked for the East Indies. After travelling over that country from Calcutta to Nepaul, he sailed for South America, visiting Buenos Ayres, Valparaiso, Havannah, Vera Cruz, and Mexico, and closing his American travels by a residence of some length at New York. During all these journeyings he exercised his profession actively, giving concerts, and gaining renown everywhere by his brilliant performances on the piano and the violin. In 1845 he arrived in London, whither his name had preceded him; and he immediately took his place among the ablest virtuosi of the day. He now made his first essay in dramatic composition by the production of "Maritana," which was performed at Drury Lane, under the management of Mr. Bunn, and met with extraordinary success, having had an uninterrupted run of nearly a hundred nights. His second opera, "Matilda of Hungary," was produced in 1847. It did not become so popular as "Maritana," though it was regarded by many critics as of equal or even greater merit. Soon after the appearance of "Maritana," he received an invitation to superintend its representation, in a German version, at Vienna. He complied, and "Maritana" was received with as much enthusiasm in the Austrian capital as in London. After leaving Germany he went to Paris, where he was engaged to compose a work for the Grand Opera, when he was seized with a complaint in the eyes, and remained for several months nearly blind. A long sea-voyage being recommended by his medical attendants, he sailed, in 1849, for Rio Janeiro, whence he went to New Orleans and New York, returning to London in 1852. Here he occupied himself in writing operas for the "Pyne and Harrison company" and in producing miscellaneous vocal and instrumental compositions. His principal operas were "Lurline," "The Amber Witch," "Love's Triumph," and "The Desert Flower." These, his numerous songs, and pieces for the pianoforte, which are well known to the public, have given him a place in the highest rank of English musicians. About a year ago he went to Paris, and was soon afterwards attacked by the long and lingering malady which terminated his life. Having sought a milder climate in the south of France, he died at the Chateau de Bagnes, in the Pyrenees, on the 12th of October last, in his fifty-second year, deeply regretted for his virtues and amiable qualities by all who knew him.

THE NEW SPANISH FRIGATE VICTORIA.

ABOUT the same time, on Saturday week, when the new armoured built for the Italian Government was launched at Millwall a similar scene took place in yard of the Thames Iron Works Company, at Blackwall—the launching, namely, of a magnificent iron-clad frigate for the Queen of Spain. The Victoria, so called as a compliment to our own Sovereign, is a beautiful model, in which the object of the constructors was to combine, as far as possible, the speed and graceful outline of the Warrior with the solidity and resisting powers of the Minotaur. Her length between the perpendiculars is 316 ft.; her keel (for tonnage), 282 ft.; breadth, 57 ft.; and depth of hold, 38 ft. Her burden in tons is 4862 tons and a fraction; her armament, thirty guns of large calibre; and her engines, which were made by Penn and Co., of 1000-horse nominal power. She has been about two years in construction, and when she descended majestically into the water her splendid lines and general symmetry of appearance were the objects of general admiration. The launch was witnessed by a most distinguished company. There were the Duke and Duchess de Montpensier; the two Infantes of Spain, Aunalia and Christina; the Prince de Joinville, the Count de Paris, Marquis de Molins (Spanish Ambassador at the Court of St. James's), Admiral Mazzo, the Count de Torres Rios, General Sir Andrew Waugh, Admiral Hall, the Chevalier Moriette, Mr. Rolt (chairman of the company), Captain Ford (formerly of the Ottoman navy and now general manager of the works), and a number of Turkish notabilities, whose interest in what they saw was very much enhanced by the fact that a monster iron-clad, defended by 10-in. plates, is about immediately to be laid down on the slip just vacated by the Victoria for their Government. There was also an immense crowd of English, and underneath the great ship herself were nestled a host of workmen, hammers in hand, ready to knock away the dogshores when the baptismal rite had been performed. Soon after one o'clock two Catholic clergymen—the Rev. Padre Borcelli, a Spanish priest resident in London, and the Rev. George Crowley, of Kilburn—habited in cassock, surplice, and stole, made their way through the crowd and took their place near the Royal guests in the gallery at the bow. They proceeded at once to bless the ship in the form prescribed by the Roman ritual, using the following prayer:—"Be propitious, O Lord! to our supplication, and with thy holy right hand bless this ship and all those in it bears, as Thou didst deign to bless with saving hand the ark of Noah floating over the deluge; stretch forth Thy right hand to them, O Lord! as Thou didst to Peter walking on the sea, and send thine angel from heaven to deliver and guard it and all it bears from all dangers. Bless Thy servants with a favourable voyage to the port they desire, and in due time deign to restore them to their own in joy and prosperity." The ship was then sprinkled with holy water, and, the religious rite thus completed, the Duchess de Montpensier took her appointed station, bottle in hand, the ship's name, Victoria, was pronounced, the frail glass shivered against the iron plates, the strokes of a thousand hammers were heard all together, and in less than two minutes the great ship was floating proudly on the wet dock, surrounded by a whole fleet of tug-boats and row-boats, which looked as if they had come there to set off her huge size to the best advantage by contrast. There was a good deal of cheering, and the band played "Rule Britannia" and the Spanish national hymn, and then the whole party adjourned to the modelling-loft, which had been tastefully decorated with the Spanish colours, and where Messrs. Ring and Brymer had arranged an elegant and abundant dejeuner. The Royal Princes and Princesses entered into the festivity with great cordiality and affability, and the Spanish Ambassador, the Marquis de Molins, spoke with much eloquence in the sonorous and manly Spanish language on the great fact of the day. His Excellency gracefully complimented England upon having led the world in the utilisation of iron for the works of peace. Formerly when one spoke of iron one thought only of swords, and guns, and cannon-balls; but England had turned it to other and better purposes—to the construction of railroads, of steam machinery, and of the fleets of commerce. It was only as a measure of defence that she built her great iron war-ships, and in this Spain followed her example. The main object of the rulers of that great country now was to develop her internal resources, to dig up her mines and minerals, and to cover her surface with a network of railways, such as already had conferred such wealth and so many blessings on England. With the friendly co-operation of England he hoped to see these views carried out, and with these views he gave as a toast, "The intimate and friendly alliance of the two countries." This toast was cordially received. The chairman of the company, Mr. Bolt; the commander of the new frigate, Captain de Benager; and other gentlemen, spoke to the succeeding toasts.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE, Nov. 12.—There was very little English wheat on sale in to-day's market, fairish average quality. It sold very full quotations; but inferior kinds were very dull, at barely late rates. Foreign wheat—the supply of which was only moderate—changed hands slowly, on former terms. Floating cargoes of grain were in poor demand, at late rates. Barley, malting and grinding, in request, at very full prices; whilst grinding and distilling sorts ruled firm. Malt was quite as dear as last week, with a steady inquiry for the best pale qualities. Oats moved off slowly, at late rates; while beans were steady, and in the quotations of the past quarter. Both beans and peas moved off freely, at full currencies. The transactions in flour were on a restricted scale, however, save regarding fine qualities, which were in full request, at all other kinds of produce, to-day, were unaltered, as follows:—

Wheat, 30s. to 34s.; barley, 22s. to 28s.; malt, 36s. to 42s.; oats, 15s. to 19s.; peas, 28s. to 30s.; beans, 25s. to 30s.; flour, 22s. to 28s.; seeds, 30s. to 36s.; linseed cake, £9 to £9 10s.

FORBES'S DRAWING-ROOM PIANOFORTE COMPOSITIONS.

The "Circle" of Ice, 3 numbers, each containing a selection of popular pianoforte music—elegant trifles for the dancing-room—Mr. George Forbes has published a series of pianoforte pieces, which, for the purpose for which they are intended, could not be heard, and is certainly of the richest and neatest feeling. He has the faculty of adorning his melodies, without over-elaboration, with such modifications and elongues of the musician's art. His variations invariably have the merit of preserving the air in its purity, and of not overlaying it with a load of fanciful ornament. We predict for Mr. Forbes a large amount of popularity for all Mr. Forbes's pieces."—Era.

THE LATE CONFEDERATE CRUISER THE SHENANDOAH IN THE MERSEY.—SEE NEXT PAGE.

THE PNEUMATIC DESPATCH TUBE: THE END OF THE TUBE AT HOLBORN ON THE OPENING DAY.—SEE PAGE 496.

THE SHENANDOAH IN THE MERSEY.

THE arrival of the late Confederate cruiser Shenandoah in the port of Liverpool, and her surrender by Captain Waddell to the commander of H.M.S. Donegal, Captain Paynter, by whom, in obedience to the orders of our Government, she has since been given up to the consular agents of the United States Government, have been already made known to our readers. We give an illustration of this famous vessel, formerly named the Sea King, built at Glasgow, in 1863, by Messrs. Alexander Stephens and Sons, on the composite principle introduced by them, which consists of an iron framework, with teak on deck below the water-line and with teak above. Her dimensions are 220 ft. in length, 32 ft. 3 in. in breadth, and 17 ft. 6 in. in depth; her tonnage is 1018 tons register, or 1350 tons builders' measurement. She is rigged as a full clipper-ship, and fitted with engines of 200-horse power, by Messrs. Laird, of Birkenhead. She was first chartered by the British Government to take out troops and a battery for New Zealand; thence she proceeded to Foochow and Shanghai, loaded a full cargo of teas, and made the passage home to London in seventy-nine days, running down the Channel on the voyage. On her arrival at Melbourne she was chosen by Confederate agents, bought by a Liverpool man, and cleared for Bombay in ballast. She was met off Madeira by the Clyde-built screw-steamer Laurel, which had been purchased by the same agents, and took out an agent from that port with the armament of the future Shenandoah. After Adler had on board her armament and guns the Shenandoah hoisted the Confederate flag: the master, Corbett, who had been taken off Madeira, having a bill of sale made out in his favour, returned and said he had sold his ship. The Shenandoah, having commenced her destructive mission, did vast damage to the commerce of the Northern States, as long as the war lasted. After the beginning of this year, she suddenly turned up at Melbourne, and, after receiving a fresh stock of supplies, sailed for the North Pacific Ocean, where, however, that the commander was repeatedly told by the masters of neutral vessels whom he met on the high seas that the war between the North and South had terminated, he refused to believe them. Long after Lee's surrender and Davis's capture, Captain Waddell burned, sunk, and otherwise destroyed whole fleets of whalers in the Ochotsk Sea and Behring's Strait. Nothing more was heard of the Shenandoah until her arrival a fortnight since in the Mersey. Her guns, still on deck, all her armament being stowed away below in boxes. The crew of the Shenandoah numbered 134 men, and when she was surrendered, Captain Waddell and some of the officers separated. Since setting out on her work of destruction the Shenandoah had destroyed thirty-seven vessels, the majority of which were whalers, and those were destroyed because they were deemed hostiles. To show how the operations of the Shenandoah affected the Arctic oil market, we may state that the quantities amongst the whaling fleets has caused sperm oil to run up from £70 to £120 per ton, and it is likely to advance still further, as, until the news of the surrender of the Shenandoah reaches the ports of the whale whalers depart, the Arctic seas will certainly be bare of the customary amount of whaling vessels. Captain Paynter, in his official letter to Lord Russell to explain his conduct, states that the last vessel he spoke was the Barracouta, from Liverpool, for San Francisco, from which he learnt that the South was really and truly defeated. On that he was quite elevated was the news of the termination in the hold, and steered for Liverpool, stopping at no other port.

A troop of the 12th Hussars has left Norwich for Ipswich, which is to be their winter quarters. There are now three troops of cavalry in Ipswich Barracks, under the command of Captain M'Neil.

Her Majesty has approved of the appointment of Assistant Surgeon Manley, V.C., to be a staff-surgeon, in consideration of the meritorious services rendered by him in the field of battle and hospital during the recent operations in New Zealand.

On Monday morning the battalion of Grenadier Guards quartered at the Short-street Barracks, Windsor, marched, under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel Higginson and Captain Buckinghamshire, to the Home Park, where the troops had a field-day. The battalion, consisting of two companies, went through a number of evolutions, which, with the firing, were extremely well executed.

The military authorities at home have consented to the proposition of the Indian Government to reduce the number of officers at Madras by one from each regiment. The vacancy of the first battalion 16th Royal Irish Regiment, caused by the retirement of Major Hamilton, has been sold out; and the vacancy of Captain Lee Childe, who has exchanged on retiring on half-pay in the spring, the place in Bengal being taken by one of the battalion quartered in the Madras Presidency. The 44th, 56th, 57th, the 64th, 72nd, 84th, 95th, and first battalion 18th, under orders for home.

An examination of candidates for direct commissions before the Vice-President and Council of Military Education, and the members of the Royal Military College,—an examination which is the test for admission to the Royal Military College, Sandhurst, before the Inspecting Field Officer, Major-General Sir Thomas Troubridge, at the Royal Military College, this week.—The next examination of candidates for admission to the Royal Military Academy, Woolwich, before the Vice-President and Council of Military Education, will be held at the Royal Hospital, Chelsea, in June next.

The Field Marshal Commanding-in-Chief visited Aldershott camp on Tuesday, when field operations on a novel scale took place. The Royal Engineers were accompanied by a number of pontoons, arrived at Farnborough at nine o'clock, and was there met by General Sir John Lysons, K.C.B., and the head-quarter staff at Aldershott. Mounting their chargers, the Royal party proceeded through the camp, visiting the permanent barracks and the site of the proposed new cavalry barracks, in the position occupied by the troops, Cæsar's Camp and Bunces Hill. The operations of the day lasted nearly two hours, and were of a highly interesting character. At the conclusion of the march past, the troops took up their original positions, and returned to the field. The troops remained in their winter quarters about two o'clock, having been under arms between six and seven hours.

THE VOLUNTEER MOVEMENT.

Last Saturday evening the thirteenth and fourteenth companies of the Queen's (Westminster), forming the St. Martin's division, mapped together, at the Hippodrome Tavern, Cranbourn-alley, Arthur Kinloch, M.P., president. Colonel Bridges, Inspector-General of Volunteers, inspected the companies, and expressed himself highly satisfied with their appearance. He believed, as well as he could judge of drill, as they were during the preceding year. In reference to the former, the Colonel said he was sorry to see that a good opinion obtained by on the latter part was not always kept up, but from the reports of the military inspectors throughout the country. With regard to the Queen's, he was, without doubt, one of the smartest of the regiments in the service; and St. Martin's had reason to be proud of the contingent which it supplied to the volunteer force of the country.

On Wednesday week the return match took place between twenty members of the Victoria and twenty members of the second battalion of the Queen's (Westminster), at Worm-wood scrubbs, and resulted in favour of the Victorias (for the second time) by 79 marks.

The Victoria autumn prize-meeting took place on the 3rd inst., at their range at Stanmore, on which occasion prizes to the value of £70 were shot for and competed for. The first prize, value £15, was won by Lieutenant Keene; second, £10, by Lieutenant Dickins; third, £8, by Sergeant Semenair; fourth, £6, by Private Thornbury; fifth, £5, by Sergeant Barry; sixth, £5, by Private Thornbury; seventh, £3, by Private Cotterell; eighth, £3, by Corporal Nicholas; ninth, £3, by Sergeant Hallett; tenth, £3, by Private Clapham; eleventh, £1, by Private B. Dever; and other minor prizes. The battalion challenge plate, value 25 guineas, was won by Sergeant Semenair, who had Private Thornbury and Sergeant Barry but was declared the winner of the plate, according to the Wimbledon rule of deciding ties. This being the third time Sergeant Semenair has won the challenge plate, it becomes his property.

The annual prize-meeting of the fourth company of the 19th Middlesex took place on the 6th inst., at the Regent range, also a match between the first and fourth companies. The various competitions were carried on with great spirit until dusk, with the following results:—A silver cup, given by Captain Hodgson, was won by Private Bowden. The other prizes were secreated into two divisions. First division, three ranges: first prize, Sergeant Private Hoskins; second, Private Bowden; third, Sergeant Bowman. Second division, two ranges: first prize, Corporal Zachary; second, Private Bowden; third, Private Hoskins. Aggregate prize, Private Bowden; second, Private Hoskins. In the match the fourth company scored 122 marks and the third company 120, and the former company won by two and a-half times consecutive shots. The prizes, with Captain Hodgson at the regimental meeting, will be presented, on Dec. 1, in Westminster Hall.

On the 3rd inst. the rifle contests, organised by the East and West India Dock Company from their respective body of employés at the docks, were brought to a close at the Victoria Tavern, Poplar, and marched to the company's new lecture-hall, in the West India Docks, where the prizes were distributed by Mr. Chairman Berens, in the absence of the latter gentleman, the chairman (Mr. Kenchard) having briefly addressed the meeting in the forenoon. The chairman, in presenting the prizes, complimented the men on the successful competitors in the following order:—The directors' prizes—the first two prizes of £5 and £3 were won by Sergeant Hall and Private Bell, both in Private Wadman; Mr. G. Collins's to Colour-Sergeant Bowlen; Mr. W. Hibbert's to Lieutenant Sheppey; Captain Wilson's to Private Wilson; Captain Scott's to Private Andrews, and a record to Private Search; Lieutenant-Colonel Scratchley's to Private Wadman; Mr. Hart's to Private Andrews; Ensign Hughes's to Private Grace; and Ensign Smith's to Private Salter.

The annual prize-meeting of the Bermondsey companies of the Finsbury corps has taken place at Rainham. In the A company match, Sergeant Bennett was first, Sergeant Mitchell second, and Private Ellis second, presented by Ensign Vine, by Colour-Sergeant Smith; the third and fourth prizes were won by Richard Nunn, M.P., and Lieutenant Harry and Captain Raley. In the D company, the whole of whose prizes were presented by Captain Hall, the first prize was won by Colour-Sergeant Bowden.

The Queen's Prize.—The thirty-fifth annual competition for the Queen's Prize will commence at Wimbledon on Monday next, and will be brought to a close on Saturday, the 13th inst. The number of competitors will be limited to 200, and the conditions will be the same as those which governed the competition last year.

About sixty members of the company of the 7th Surrey, including officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates, dined recently with Captain Lucas at the Sergeants' Inn Tavern, Fleet-street, to celebrate the event.

The presentation of prizes won by members of the 19th Surrey (Lambeth) Rifle Corps, in the Metropolitan Rifle Association, on Monday night, before a large assemblage of ladies and other friends of the corps, took place in the Lambeth Baths Assembly-room, in which the various pieces, and ornaments in silver and gold plate, were displayed on a sideboard, the presentation being made by Mr. Richard Nunn, M.P., who, immediately the duties of chairman, was accompanied on the platform by Lieutenant-Colonel Lindsay, Major Bowden, Captain Hall, and other officers of the corps. Upon the Chairman, the wife of Colonel Chambers, well known as the intimate friend of the late Princess Alice, presented the prizes.

At a general meeting of the Cambridge University volunteers, held on Tuesday evening, Lieutenant-Colonel Hopkinson resigned the command to elect Viscount Royston as his successor. The motion was seconded by Lieutenant-Colonel Lord Hinchingbrooke, and carried unanimously. Three hearty cheers were given for Colonel Bulwer.

The first meeting of the 11th Middlesex Rifle Volunteers, on the 27th ult., when several prizes were contested. The first prize, a handsome silver cup, was won by Private Hall, of Company No. 1, the next by Sergeant Harding. Other prizes were won by Privates Adams, G. Levy, H. Herbert, and Sergeant Wilson. The match, in which the Duke of Cambridge is making the highest scores in the first contest took part—the prize being a silver cup given by the proprietors of the Army and Navy Gazette—was shot for, and won by Private Thomas Green.

The Rifle Competitions at the meeting of the Bath corps has been held on Hampton Down. The entries generally were numerous, and the shooting was good. The following are the principal winners were Messrs. Hick, Young, Drake, Brecher, Hay, Hendrum, and Hinton.

Last Saturday the eighth prize competition of the 2nd Manchester took place on the corporation rifle-ground, Kersal-moor, between the companies commanded by Captain Ball, Chesham, and Douglas; Colour-Sergeants Black and Leech, and Sergeant Bradbury. The match was won by the 57th Lancashire (Douglas's) company, by 5 points. Lieut. Leigh, to compete for Major Bower's cup, value fifteen guineas, which is open to the whole battalion, and the remaining competitions, which, on the 27th ult. was won by Captain Jee. The previous competition at Clifton Moor included the following prizes, which were competed for by the 57th Lancashire corps held the following prize-meetings on the 24th ult.:—The Clifton Cup, presented by Private Wm. Robinson, of Clifton Moss. The first prize was won by Private R. Rodway. The other prizes were won by Sergeant Hall, Private Hodgkinson, Private Bond, Private Jas. Green, Colour-Sergeant J. Clay and Sergeant J. Hayes, Private R. Robinson, Private Wm. Green, Private Hodgkinson, Private C. Kelsey, Private H. Green, Private Bond, Sergeant Hall, Private Bond, and J. Potter, Sergeants R. Preston and J. Brooks.—The Pendleton Challenge Cup, presented by the Lancashire Volunteer Association, was won by Private Wm. Green. A number of prizes contested for, among which were a silver cup, presented by Captain Robinson, for efficient members of the battalion, winner of the three parades during the past season; a silver watch, value £5, presented by Private Wm. Robinson, for the best shot in the battalion during the year's drills during the season; an "Horatia Rose" contest, open to efficients only; and the competition for the prizes presented by Mr. Hay, the contest for position for the various prizes lasted till dusk, at which latter time several of the prizes were decided. The Captain's cup, won by Private Rose. The Major's contest.—The Captain's cup, won by Sergeant Salthouse; silver watch, value £5, presented by Private Wm. Robinson, Private Hulme, Private Holder, 1, 2, 3; Private Rose, 1 and 2, and Sergeant Richardson; the first recruit prize—Sergeant Clarke. The shooting for the Sergeant's cup and Saturday's competition will take place on the 1st inst. The Hyrgate company of the 5th Lancashire at Broadoak, near Bury, between the members of the company and Mr. Hay, the captain taking the second place. The members of No. 10 company competed for a challenge cup and four money prizes, given by Captain Hamilton, of Bolton, Lancashire, the latter having to allow one point for shooting with a London armoury. In shooting off the first prize, which was a silver cup, Private Hamilton, the second.—Upwards of one hundred members of the 2nd Manchester assembled on the range at Kersal-moor, on Saturday afternoon last, to compete for prizes. The principal winners were Colour-Sergeant W. Hambleton, Sergeant Newton, and Private J. Taylor.

The annual prize-meeting of the Wakefield Battalion began on Tuesday and was continued on Wednesday and Thursday. The first competition was for Lieutenant-Colonel Holdsworth's prize of £15 and the Mayor's medal. The gold medal has again fallen to the lot of a Wakefield volunteer, Private Boston; £7 accompanied the medal. The best score was 51 out of a possible 60, Private Boston making 49, Private Joseph Whitlam, and 45 went to him; the second prize to Private G. Dickins, Goole; third prize, £3, to Private Wm. Hall, Goole; fourth prize, £2, to Private Wm. Hall, Wakefield; fifth prize, £1, to Private Hall, Goole; the next prize was for Lieutenant-Colonel Holdsworth's best attendance prize of £10, which was divided into seven prizes of £2 each. Private Joseph Whitlam, Major Normanby prize for time-firing (47) was divided between Colour-Sergeant Rayner, of Goole, and Private Whitlam, of Wakefield. Major Normanby's prizes, £7 equally divided, for fix and volley firing were both gained by Captain Gilbert Gregory, of Goole, and Lieutenant Hinckley gained the next prize, £5, and G. F. Dudley, Goole; and Corporal Cooper, Wakefield.

The Duke of Cambridge, Lord Lieutenant of Durlington, Durham, on Wednesday week, for the purpose of presenting the prizes some time since won by the 1st Durham Rifle Volunteers. The ceremony took place in the spacious new drill-shed erected for the corps. Lieutenant-Colonel Stansfield commanded the corps, and Major Hedley was present with the bands of the corps, and had also promised two prizes of £10 and £5 each respectively to be competed for by the non-commissioned officers of vocal and instrumental music took place, and in the evening there was a ball.

The Queen has appointed William Webb Follet-Synge, Esq., her Majesty's Consul-General in the island of Cuba, to be her Majesty's Judge in the Court established at the Havannah, under the Treaty of the 28th of June, 1835, between Great Britain and Spain, for the abolition of the slave trade.

A war-ship, under the Ottoman flag, has appeared for the first time these thirty years in the roadstead of Algiers, and, after casting anchor, fired a salute in recognition of French sovereignty over that quondam fragment of Turkeydom. The French journals take note of the fact, and add that it was only as late as 1848 that General Bruat took exactly the same method of formally acknowledging the annexation of Algeria.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

THE favours which the fates deny to Liverpool racing in the summer were showered bountifully on the autumn meeting. Eighteen went for the Autumn Cup, in which Ethelred (who had been at "20 to 1 off" with the redoubtable Valiant), after his tumble in the Ascot Plate, quite reversed his Doncaster running with John Davis, and won in a canter. Dolly, the Chester Cup winner, was the most distinguished of a lot of moderate ones at Aintree. Island, by Hampton from Miss Hervine, was bred by Colonel Townley (whose King of Trumps stock was not during the week), and, with the highest-priced yearling (900 gs.) of the ten which went up from the Middle Park Stud paddocks to York in 1868. Mr. Thomas Queen's Flute, on Monday, at Shrewsbury, whose meeting extends over five days, was the first horse that left Epsom, and was the Houghton.

Island and the Isles is, like Argonaut, Dunkeld, Barnton, Lord Burleigh, &c., for sale. Beadsman leaves Leybourne (where Asteroid will now hold sway), and is stationed at Middlethorpe. Dundas goes to Croft, and Lord Clifden to Mr. Thompson's farm, near York. Mr. Cockerell (who has a yearly by him) has sold his colt by Lord Lyon, looking Buccaneer for, we hear, £3000, through Colonel De Butts, to the Austrian Government. Mr. Merry has given up his racing-stable, on which went up from the Gem, in foal to Fulmeclon as a two-year-old, to Mr. Merry's son, who is now sister to Regalia. The brother to Regalia, which she foaled the season after Mr. Merry left Epsom, remains broad. Mr. Hankinson has, we believe, concluded no bargain as yet for Ely, but he has bought Mr. Crowther Harrison's foals. Next year he will have about sixty yearlings, of which forty five are to be sold at his regular sale, and the remainder at Mr. G. Ramsdell's, at Middlethorpe, Doncaster.

Mr. Adeline crossed the Tweed for the first time this year, and ran up with Miss Peggy to Lord Binning's Brindles for the Haughmond Abbey Stakes at Shrewsbury. Mr. Chaloner has not brought out Cinabarcoco this year; but his Lordship won the Uffington Stakes with Mr. Sadler's Lady Langden, beating Lisa by Secretary. Sir Rowley, a son of Seagull, beat Miss Barleycorn in the run up for the Selection Cup, and Rita won a good race before the latter in her very first course. The Coquetdale meeting was not singularly lucky for the Cumberland blood. Three by him (one of them Armstrong Gun of the Australian stamp) were beaten by Mr. Cookson's Bertrand, Mr. Crawford's and Chanmer, a brother and sister, divided the Biddlestone Stakes, and Mr. Cookson's Queen of the Arrington Vale divided the Barndon Stakes with Curiosity. His own brother, King Death, the Wykeham of the Northern Turf, is to be tried with whatever in his second course with Brightness. Marham, "the Old Swallow Stakes" winner, is for sale, and now in an eighteenth year, had a great meeting, and Mr. Villebois, as usual, handled the ribs in a field of fourteen runners, a colonel of cavalry. It was stated at the dinner that he would never have given up his hounds if he found he had been properly preserved; but, judging from what was said at the presentation of the testimonial, Mr. Villebois's hunt had been one of some round, and the East and West Norfolk masters presume five or six days a-week to be their proper quota. We should not be surprised to hear that Mr. Villebois and Mr. Dean each give a 20-guinea cup to the Swaffham Club next year.

The American champion sculler, Hammill, is anxious that Kelley should come over and row another match there; but we believe he is now in England, five miles straight, and then two miles and a-half to row home against the tide, with a side each race; provided he may choose the course, and have £100 for his expenses.

The annual Field list for the present season shows that there have been twenty-two thousand nine hundred and fifty-five entered, and that nine whips, including sons of Harry Ayris and Jem Hills, have come up to the standard. Twelve packs of stag-hounds remain as they are, and the four-hounds, 113 in England, eight in Scotland, and twenty-one in Ireland. The Burton Hunt Steeplechase Committee have for two years days a week, have eighty-five and eighty-one couple of hounds respectively, and hunt; the Cottesmore only seventy-five, but six days a week; and the Wynnstay sixty-five, for four. The Meath have sixty-two couple of hounds and are the only five-days-a-week pack in Ireland. About forty-four of the packs are hunted by the Master: among whom Sir Henry Seale is, we believe, the senior. Oswald Leicester, who was the youngest of the masters of the Quorn commons to the Horsham and Crawley, is not yet suited with a place. The Cheshire have had a very successful mishap of the season, as an express-train killed three of "the lady pack," near Hartford station, and an injured some others, on the line which passes by the side of the accident on the following day.

The Cambridgeshire is the scrutinee of the season place Jupp, who has been in seventy-one times, at the head of the list, with a twenty-five average and the 1865 Cambridgeshire in hand, having won nearly twenty-three, in exactly as many innings as Carpenter. Parr's betting has been steady and successful, and Mr. H. Stephenson and Blenkiron's Charlwood, a mere lad of sixteen, has also proved a most promising colt for Sussex. Tinley's bowling for All-England has been very remarkable, as he has taken 301 wickets in thirty-nine innings; while Humphrey's 1000 runs in twenty-nine innings are twenty-eight innings for Surrey, which sorely needs some more efficient bowling.

The celebrated Tom Sayers was buried at Highgate Cemetery, on Wednesday last, in the presence of a large concourse of his friends. His well-known dun cob and gig, and his St. Bernard mastiff, were in the procession. The coffin was carried by hand playing the "Dead March" in "Saul." Flags were hung half-mast high and funeral minute guns were fired. The interment took place after the end of rapid consumption, induced by careless living, when he was six months short of forty.

Philip Griffith, Esq., late her Majesty's Chargé-d'Affaires to the United States of Columbia, is appointed Consul at Cuba.

Lord Dacre, who has been appointed her Majesty's Lieutenant of the county of Sussex, has taken the oath at the Council Office, Whitehall, on Tuesday.

The American bishopric in China, which became vacant by the death of Bishop Boone, has been conferred on the Rev. William Channing Pitts Williams, a missionary at Ningpo, residing in China since 1837.

A monument is to be erected in Brussels in honour of the soldiers of the Belgian Legion who fell at Tarambire, in Mexico. The names of the long and sad list are to be found on the subscription list.

A decree of the Prince of Roumania, Wallachia, and Moldavia has conceded to the Electric Telegraph Company the right of communicating gratis with their clergy by the post office or electric telegraph in all military stations.

An Italian delegation has presented to President Johnson a petition, signed by thousands of Italian residents and citizens now in Italy, urging him to obtain capital punishment in the United States, and to begin in the case of Mrs. Surratt.

A Cabinet Council was held, on Tuesday, at the official residence of the Prime Lord of the Treasury, in Downing-street. His Excellency present were—Earl Russell, the Lord Chancellor, Earl Granville, the Duke of Argyll, Sir Charles Wood, Sir George Grey, Edward Cardwell, Esq., the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Duke of Somerset, the Right Hon. T. Milner Gibson, and Lord Stanley of Alderley.

Letters for Switzerland, when prepaid, will in future be liable to postage to the extent of 10 centimes per ounce, instead of 20, as heretofore, the postage is not prepaid such letters will be liable to an extra charge on delivery. The above regulations will not apply to letters from Italy, which is the ordinary route for letters addressed to Switzerland. Any letters which may be accidentally allowed to be forwarded via Belgium will continue chargeable with the present postage of 8d. the single rate.

The following diplomatic and consular appointments have been gazetted:—F. Minford and E. C. H. Phipps, Esqs., Third Secretaries, to be Second Secretaries in Her Majesty's Diplomatic Service; Mr. J. Wood, Chargé d'Affaires to the Free Hanseatic cities of Lubeck, Bremen, and Hamburg, to be Minister Resident to those cities; Mr. R. Bunch, Consul-General in the Island of Cuba, to be Chargé d'Affaires and Consul-General to the Republics of Guatemala, Nicaragua, Costa Rica, Honduras, and Salvador, in Central America; and Mr. W. W. F. Synge, Commissioner and Consul-General in the Sandwich Islands, to be Consul-General in the Island of Cuba; Mr. G. Wort, Vice-Consul at Suez, to be Consul at the same port; Mr. T. B. Sandwith, Vice-Consul at Caifta, to be Vice-Consul at Cyprus; Mr. E. Dalzel, Consul at Jassy, to be Consul at Roustchouk; and Mr. A. S. St. Clair, Consul at Galatz, to be Consul at Jassy.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

Three Years among the Working Classes in the United States during the War. By the Author of "The Autobiography of a Beggar-boy." (Smith, Elder, and Co.) The title of this book raises expectations doomed to disappointment. One looks for a round, unvarnished tale of the author's own experience; of his reasons for leaving his native country; of the hopes he had formed, and how they were fulfilled or unfulfilled; of the feelings of his class on the breaking out of the great Civil War; of the manner in which industry and wages were affected by the war; of the alacrity or unwillingness with which native Americans in his special department (as a map engraving, in fact, social, moral, and political, about which a three-years' sojourn in the United States would enable him to speak with authority) met at an eye-witness. But, with some pretentiousness of style, he wields the pen of a censor and critic of the United States in general; he by no means confines himself to matters in which he has taken part and on which he might consequently claim a right to be heard; he "learns from a multitude of books," and has "read" reports, and he quotes long paragraphs from newspapers and published reports, and altogether gives us, in place of the fresh stores of travellers who choose to employ their time in such business, and who, by education, habit, and discipline, are likely to perform such labour better than one who calls himself "a working man," and who appears to be engraved in the last finish. There is a preface about the cobbler and his last, and the same proverb, with the requisite changes, may be applied to the latter. If the latter had wrought a book touching what came under his personal observation in the exercise of his trade and the concomitants he would probably have turned out something original, interesting, and useful; but he has not done so, and only a warmed-up hash of stale stories about the degeneracy of the American man, the fulsome encomium of the chief of Americans, the deficient supply of natural nourishment for little Americans yet to be born, the injustice given to mankind by "the black-coated and broadcloth" house, the looseness of the matrimonial tie, the absurdities and wickedness of certain anti-slavery agitators, are served up—some of all that kind of thing. It has frequently been commented upon before in better fashion. Let all strangers beware, however, of the working man who takes advantage of the fact that the schoolmaster is abroad, but not encourages the "working man" in bookmaking. If he have anything to say that is "common sense" or an imaginative spirit suggests—or it be be bursting with enthusiasm—or if his brain, overladen with facts, will not let him—or if his peculiar line of life have taught him anything which he thinks it may be of advantage to others that they should be taught, let him publish it; but, in any other case, he would do well to abstain. Indeed, the author himself suggests that one object of emigration which may be found useful. Let hatters attend to the following advice (p. 169)—"If a manufacturer knows, as he does in the United Kingdom, can earn from twenty-five to thirty shillings a week, I would certainly advise his emigrating to America, as nor do I know any class of tradesmen, under the altered circumstances of the country, who are likely to better their condition." Economical person, however, may perhaps be otherwise employed by the last statement (p. 180) that "men can be drunk in America without the use of intoxicating liquors." But the impression left upon the reader's mind is attained is not mentioned. It may be that personal disappointment has blinded us to the merits of the book, but we can find none in it, except in the ninth, fourteenth, and fifteenth chapters, the author has performed a work of supererogation.

Idyls and Legends of Inverburn. By Robert Buchanan. (Alexander Strahan.) The thrilling echoes of the "Ballads of Life, Love, and Humour" vibrate in the readers' hearts when Mr. Buchanan proved that he was not going to let the soul of music slumber within him. His "Undertones" gave wonderful promise, and his subsequent publications have realised it. He has many moods, but he is most delightful when he is sweet, low, and plaintive as a woman's voice whispering to her lover. It is the fashion to say that the spirit of poesy has altogether evaporated from the age. We have nothing to complain of, nor does the history of poetry lead us to expect them at the present stage of our literature; but there is much reason to fear that the publication of the outpourings of Tennyson, Browning, Jeaffreson, Capern, Coventry Patmore, and Buchanan, &c. &c. will have a bad effect upon a host of others, such as Ira Craig and lesser lyrists.

The Book of Gardens. By Charles McIntosh. (Simpson Low, Son, and Marston.) A collection of "light and pleasant articles," reprinted from divers periodicals. The first article, which is unique, being sentimental and written in poetic prose, is the best in the first volume; and the volume is as ornamental as taste would require. Playfulness and the questionable Humour are not its strong points. The wit is not dazzling, the wisdom is not profound, and the drollery is not irresistible; but the matters, such as it is, is light and fresh as the palates of those who drank draughts of pleasure from the fountain of Lin of which the source was in Vivian Grey's head.

Domestic Practice of Medicine. By W. B. Kesteven. (Longmans.) A "Friend of the Royal Humane Society" considers that he has compiled a manual which everbody who is not "fever-proof and like-wise ague," and exempt from fatal accidents in general, would not be the worse for having at hand. It is not very pleasant reading when you are so in health, and, when you are a little out of sorts, you may, by reading the list of symptoms, credit yourself with innumerable diseases to which you have no right to lay claim; but, if you can only make up your mind what is the matter with you, it is very useful with instructions. There is reason to believe that it has already done good service and it will do more.

The Art and Mystery of Making British Wines, &c. (Hampton and Mall.) The author of "Cookery and Pastry, Pickles and Preserves, Game, Fish, &c.," has the boldness to deal with a subject about which men usually approach with reverence a discreet, and with the respect of being very largely consumed in this country; but our authors can safely take you how to make it, and some countless other decoctions such as connoisseurs would shudder to hear mentioned in the same breath. British stomach is supposed, after boyish days are over, to revolt against the various but blank of fermented liquors; but the British liver, however, is in high favour; and our author not only divulges the secrets of wine-making, but what is more important, deals with "the whole art of brewing."

Handbook for the Man of Business. (F. Pitman.) The qualities imitated upon in this book as necessary to success in business have been for years of years impressed upon the rising generation by copy-books and by other means; but constant iteration is not always objectionable. The advice given in the present volume is sound, and seems to have been carefully considered; and the information he given is certainly of a useful character.

Who is the Heir? By Mortimer Collins. (John Maxwell and Co.) Two would be an excellent three-volume novel if the merits, of which there are some, were equal in number to the faults, of which there are many. It would seem as if the author had at first intended and then ceased to imitate the manner of Charles Reade. There is the tumbling of romance and politics, and there is the flashy, bombastic diction of the great master of fiction and humour; but we are soon assured that "this is not a political novel," upon which we are inclined to ask why then, in the name of common sense, the mischief of politics, for the story is unaffected thereby. We have complication and mystery of plot, and disposal instead of elegant writing. The chief merit of the novel is the vivacity which characterises the style; the next is the conception and portraiture of one or two characters, especially of Vivian Ashleigh; and the last is the number of pleasant quotations. The chief defects are disjointedness, wearisome crudity, and mixing of living persons and scenes with imaginary life in a sponging-house; pulls of taverns and wine merchants, or of a tavern and a wine merchant's cellar, a feeling of familiarity with drinking and smoking; and, above all, vile phrases such as (vol. i., p. 19) "inhaling the delicious freshness of the meridian air." There are puns, too, more than enough; and two young ladies rescued in their night-dresses are a very liberal allowance of semi-impropriety. The way in which Harry Mandeveer gets arrested for debt seems to us simply preposterous.

The Brothers. By Anna H. Drury. (Chapman and Hall.) This two-volume novel is brisk, amusing, and interesting until you arrive at the middle of the second volume, when there is a strong smell of bats. You begin to recognise the trick; the murdered is really the murderer (only there is no murder at all, but a mere assault and a weak-minded silence on the part of the outspoken, strong-minded man, who might have held his tongue on all other occasions without much detriment, mislead everybody; the sagacious dog smells his master, after two years' absence, through a whole suite of rooms; there is a tremendous fire, and after it everything becomes clear, and the hero and heroine have lots of children. The catastrophe, then, is by no means new, but it is led up to and brought about with certainly no less than the average skill; and there are sketches of character which do great credit to the author's powers, and show us what, in weak, what is laughable, and what is lovable in mankind.

MUSIC.

The "Africaine" continues to be the engrossing topic of the English Opera, Covent-garden, and its attraction seems not much diminished. The public, we think, have reason to complain of the manner in which it is continually given. Not only is the principal character, that of the character of Nelusko, Mr. Haigh alternates with Mr. Adams, to whom the part was originally given, and who is now ill, and Miss Thirlwall, Miss Thirlwall has been substituted for Mdme. Sherrington in the character of Inez, without any announcement of the cause. Last week a splendid performance of "Masaniello" was given, in which Mr. Charles Santley achieved a triumph in the character of the hero; and Miss Ida Gillies made a highly promising debut as Elvira. Mr. Henry Leslie's part-song, "Ida," was produced on Wednesday last, with this young lady in the principal character. Of her performance and of the opera generally we shall speak next week.

The Sacred Harmonic Society began the season at Exeter Hall, last night, by a performance of Mozart's "Requiem" and Mendelssohn's "Elijah."

The National Choral Society began their session at the same place, on Thursday last, by a performance of Mendelssohn's "Elijah."

Signor Arditi has returned to town, and will resume his musical concerts at Her Majesty's Theatre begins this evening. He has published a prospectus of the performances which he will have retained, and the list of singers includes the names of Mdlle. Sinico, Mdlle. Parepa, Mdlle. Titiens, Mdlle. Lotti, Sig. Mei, and Mr. Santley. The general conductor will be Signor Arditi; and the dance-music will be conducted by Mr. M. Godfrey. The rates of admission will be similar to those at Mr. Mellon's concerts, which will be given during the four weeks only.

Mr. Arditi's third performance of pianoforte music took place at his residence, in Westbourne-square, on Wednesday week. The programme consisted of Beethoven's Trio, in No. 10, Op. 1, Beethoven; Nocturne, Aguilar; seventeen Variations Sérieuses, Mendelssohn; Scherzo, No. 2, Liszt; two Pieces, Op. 82, Nos. 6 and 7, Schumann; Fantasia, Op. 15, Schumann; Duet, Op. 15, Arditi and Polonaise, in A flat, Chopin; Leider ohne Worte, Mendelssohn; Fantasie on an air from "Lucia," Thalberg; Duet, Op. 15, Arditi and Godfrey; and Transcriptions, Aguilar; Serenade, Aguilar. The rooms were crowded with fashionable visitors, and the performance was highly successful.

Willie Pape appears at Newcastle-on-Tyne on Monday next, the 20th inst., in company with Mr. Sims Reeves, M. Sainton, and Mdme. Sainton-Dolby.

Mdlle. Emilie Arditi, daughter of Signor Arditi, of Her Majesty's Theatre, made her first appearance at the Crystal Palace, and though only fourteen, has created an extraordinary sensation. We understand that she is to be engaged during the Italian opera at the concerts about to be given by her father at Her Majesty's Theatre.

The Paris Concerts of Popular Classical Music have begun for the season under the direction of Jules Pasdeloup, under the direction of M. Fasdeloup. The concert of Sunday last included Beethoven's Symphony in C minor, Mendelssohn's "Songs without Words," Gounod's "Marche Funèbre d'une Marionnette," Mozart's quintet in A for clarinet and stringed instruments, and Weber's Overture to "Oberon," the "Africaine," A young Belgian violinist, M. Jacques Dupuis played Beethoven's concerto with great success.

A Florence letter of the 8th says that Adelina Patti has arrived here. Never has the appearance of an artist in this city produced a greater sensation. All thoughts of Rome and Venice are for the moment forgotten, and people rush in crowds to the Pagliano theatre, where Mdme. Patti is to appear in the course of the week. The night after her arrival the choral societies assembled before the house to perform a serenade in honour of the great songstress. She will make her first appearance on the evening of the 11th."

The King of Bavaria has given orders to Professor Semper, of Munich, to build a new theatre at Munich, to be called the Wagner Theatre.

THE THEATRES.

Managements are now exceedingly active, and it is difficult to keep up with their speed. All have been anxious to produce pieces for the season which must conclude when that of Christmas commences. Thus at St. James's Theatre Mr. Buckstone is pleased with a new piece, called "Caught In The Toils"; nevertheless, a new version of "All That Glitters is not Gold" is announced. This is a modified title localising the said club by the theatre in which it is to be acted, has been added to the piece. Manager has made some judicious alterations and introduced some modern allusions, which are calculated to make the performance of the piece somewhat less than ever.

At the Olympic a new comedy has been produced, by Mr. Byron, we are indebted to the taste and diligence of Mr. Oxenford. This gentleman, who is a dramatic critic, has written a little piece, entitled "La Soupbee d'un Homme," from which he has largely borrowed, adapting, however, the incidents to his own purpose. The work "A Cleft Stick." We have called the new piece a comedy, and in that class of composition it is entitled to rank; but the dramatic stance of its being in three acts; but, if we regard the matter and arguments with which it abounds, it is more correct to consider it as a prolonged farce. On the other hand, its piquant and sparkling dialogue is worthy of a loftier and more elaborate action. The troubles of principal characters are extraordinarily ludicrous; and they are probable, as the result not of any transcendental or impossible circumstances, but of the follies of humanity. Fix, is admirably represented by Mr. H. Wigan. A well-to-do shopkeeper, with a good wife, a comfortable competency, he has been amassed into conduct which subjects him to the suspicion of both. The lovely wife, who is the representative of Mrs. Stirling, and Mrs. Strowbelow by Mrs. Stephens. The cause of the comical distresses of the husband and wife is Fix, but which Mr. Compton (Mrs. St. Henry), wife to a friend of Mr. Fix, but whom he has met a public dinner, and whom he has got drunk. The fun is produced principally by planting herself upon him, teasing him with her correspondence, and suffering him to escape from him—all to excite in her own husband, whose indifference annoys her, a feeling of jealousy. She succeeds in making him at once ridiculous and unhappy. The strong-minded Mrs. Strowbelow has a powerful representative in Mrs. Stephens, and the vehement Sybils could not be better realised than by Mrs. St. Henry. The author has been fortunate in his performers, and the piece was decidedly successful. We need not add that it was well mounted, for every piece presented at the Olympic is appropriately appointed in regard to scenery, costumes, and accessories.

A new farce was produced at the Haymarket on Monday. It is whimsically entitled "Who Killed Cock Robin?" It is a trifle, in two acts, adapted by Mr. Charles Mathews from a French piece, entitled "Le Roi des Canards," and abounds in successful travestie, vagant, is amusing. An English muffin-maker in Mexico, having married there a termagant wife, has a termagant daughter, who, on his return to England, insists on marrying one Robin; and the poor father, whose life is threatened, is fain to consent. The father is enacted by Mr. Chippendale, and the refractory offspring by Mrs. Charles Mathews. Jack Raggett (Mr. C. Mathews) then appears on the scene with a trumped up story of Robin's death in a duel at Boulogne; for Robin has repeated of his bargain, and has resorted to this ruse to avoid the lady. Setanella (such is the vixen's name) suspects Jack of Robin's murder, and to avenge his death pulls him himself to the duel with him. But she has caught a Tartar, who, by his determination of character, ultimately worsts her. Learning that Robin is still living, she dares to visit his abode, and, finding him at breakfast with another lady, threatens him and his tea-things, acting according to the measures of his disposition, rises her for the damage to his Cousin Germain. The lady in question rises the disturbance between the two men, and is led to admire and esteem the robust Jack, who defies her attack, and ultimately, strong in the justice of his cause, is still. A reconciliation ensues. The acting both of Mr. and Mrs. C. Mathews, as also of Mr. Chippendale, is full of spirit, vigour, and point. The humour is boisterous, and the dramatic situations are kept up for an hour.

A new comedy has also been produced at the Prince of Wales's. It is entitled "Society," and written by Mr. T. W. Robertson, the author of the drama on "David Garrick," which the acting of Mr. Sothern made so popular. Mr. Robertson has dared in this new piece to attempt what he gave some degree of success with its clubbic propensities; and, though somewhat roughly drawn, the portraits of the author's characters are inaccurate. Those in the gallery is Thomas Stylus, contributor and editor (Mr. P. Dewar), whose object is to obtain copy for existing at once a newspaper, and who finds them in Chodd, senior and junior (Mr. A. W. Ray and Mr. J. Clarke), Young Society by means of his journal an introduction to good society. Accordingly, he would marry him to his purpose to Sydney Dacre (Mr. Sydney Bancroft), a literary gentleman, already connected with Stylus's paper, and who has been in love with Maud Hillyngton (Miss Marie Wilton), a young lady related to a noble family. Lord Hillyngton (Mr. Compton) and Miss Blanche (Miss Kate Saville), an aunt, disapprove of the match, and favour the pretensions of young Chodd, whose father is desirous to compromise the affair vulgarity. Understanding that a marriage is impending, Daryl loses no time, by the aid of Stylus, in getting up a play at Dacre Plantagenet, proceeds to denounce the lady in rather an indecorous fashion. Young Chodd, however, by means of good luck, winning a thousand pounds of the stupid Chodd, with which he proposes to marry Miss Blanche, and so forth, and, ultimately, becomes the successful candidate. Besides ultimately, Daryl and Miss Maud Hillyngton, Mr. Bancroft, and Hillyngton are reconciled. This comedy is highly creditable to the writer; the dialogue is sparkling, and the characters are drawn with sufficient force for real dramatic effect. With the advantage of good acting it is likely to be successful.

At the New Royalty Mr. Burnand has re-introduced his burlesque of "Ixion," of course, with improvements—and, as now acted, it is likely to run for a long and welcome merry period. It follows the opera of "Folly," the success of which is evidently established. Miss Lydia Maitland (Miss Fanny Josephs) is a young lady of considerable amount of humorous exaggeration; and Miss Fanny Reeves herself makes an excellent soubrette. Mr. Lionel Brough's grotesque and natural humour escapes elegance even in extravagance and caricature. Miss Lydia Maitland, a young lady of fortune, is in love with Captain Lovell, and is in love with Venus (Miss Nelly Burton), secured the vivacity of the piece. The scenery by Mr. Gilbert, is very pretty, and the music, by Mr. Hermann, well selected.

At Sadler's Wells, "The Hunchback" and "The School for Scandal" have been the pieces of the week. We can only commend Mr. Cowper for his Master Walter. He imparts a peculiar earnestness to the character, and throughout the performance is his strange conduct towards his supposed ward; and this device serves to give great point to the piece. Miss Marriott's Julia was both vigorous and impassioned. Her Lady Teazle was not unsuccessful. Mr. Cowper all that was desirable. Mr. James Johnstone's Sir Peter was a good, steady performance, although Miss Leigh's Maria was full of promise. The business at this house is very good, and the audience display much good manners in which the legitimate drama is produced and the average merit of the company engaged for the performance of it.

Mr. and Mrs. German Reed, with Mr. John Parry, reappeared on Monday at the Gallery of Illustration, in their well-known entertainments, "A Peculiar Family," and "Ancient Concerts."

Mr. Burgess's troupe of Christy Minstrels continue to occupy St. James's Hall, and have introduced an extra day performance on Wednesdays.

The last act of the Manchester committee of the Shakspeare tercentenary festival was a meeting on Tuesday week, to distribute the scholarships of £40 per annum in Owen's College and two of £30 per annum in the Grammar School, founded by the committee. The first scholarship in the Shakspeare scholarship. The amount paid over to the trustees of each institution was £1695, the interest of which will be annually applied to the Free Grammar School, and to the encouragement of the study of the English language and literature. The scholarship at Owen's College of £40 per annum is open to any student at the college who has read for one year three, and the second either at Owen's College or some other institution to be approved by the committee. The scholarship at the Grammar School is open only to pupils at the school.

Two remarkable specimens of Chinese art have arrived in Paris. They consist of two marble statues of animals, each about 9 ft. high, which have been sent to the Emperor Napoleon by the Emperor of Siam, or of Kiang-Sen." They present the head of a lion, beautifully sculptured; the body of a dolphin, and the hind part of the fish. They are symbolical—the national and religious emblem of the Chinese. They come from the Palace of Bang-Kok, and were brought to Paris by the Siamese Ambassador to the Court of Napoleon, and are now in the Exhibition of the Champs Elysées.

An American paper states that Colonel Bulkeley's telegraph-line between Quebec and Vancouver's Island, where the gold mines from Asherton is 4,000, and that the Colonel had handed across Bishop's Strait to the Island of Anticosti, in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, a distance of 135 miles. The cable, however, has not yet been discovered off St. Laurence Bay was found to be fully 1,000 fathoms deep. The cable is to be laid across the Gulf of St. Lawrence, from Anticosti to Gaspé Bay, a distance of 90 miles. The country was entirely destitute of timber. The ground was thawed about 2 ft. deep, and the operations on both sides were friendly and cordial. The Russians had done everything possible to further the enterprise.

Sir Bernard Burke, in his "Vicissitudes of Families," gives us a touching instance of the tendency of flowers to linger upon the spots where they were once tenderly nurtured. "Dating a sketch," he tells us, "of a pedigree with reference to the Finderors, once a great family seat in Derbyshire, I sought for their ancient hall. Not a stone remained to say where it stood. I entered the church; not a single record of a Finderor was there! I ascended a village, hoping to glean some stray traditions of the Finderors. 'Finderors!' he said, 'we have no Finderors here; but we have something that belonged to them.' And he led me to a garden, and there, in the midst of a wilderness of weeds, I found a few flowers which still retained faint traces of former and foundation. 'There,' said the old man, 'in that garden, Finderors lived, and there, in the days of their greatness, they brought for the first time from the Holy Land, and, for what we will, they will never die.'"

THE CANADIAN AGRICULTURAL EXHIBITION.

THE Provincial Agricultural Association of Lower Canada opened its yearly exhibition at Montreal on the 29th of September, in conjunction with the exhibition of the Board of Arts and Manufactures and that of the Montreal Horticultural Society. The Crystal Palace, St. Catherine-street, was, as usual, occupied by the industrial department, the grounds in Guy-street by the agricultural, and the Skating Rink by the horticultural societies. Exhibitors were as backward as ever in bringing in their goods, and in all the departments many articles had to be placed at the last moment. The number of entries, however, was large; and the exhibition, as a whole, was attended with a very satisfactory measure of success. A good deal of space in the Crystal Palace was occupied by agricultural implements and machines of Canadian make; but a still larger display in that department was to be found in the showyard of the association, in Guy-street. The ground (a View of which we have engraved) was well adapted for a show of this description, being very level and of considerable extent. The sheds formed a square, the centre being occupied with pens for sheep, sheds for cows, and a show-place for the horses, roped in to prevent intrusion upon the judges, who had by no means an easy task. The show of cattle and horses was most satisfactory; the Durhams, Devons, Herefords, and other varieties of horned stock, were likewise worthy of commendation. The sheep were also very fine, the Leicesters being the favourite breed, though Southdowns, Cheviots, Merinos, and Saxons of excellent quality appeared on the ground. The swine are described as really "first rate." There were large and small breeds, from those intended to supply about the sixteenth part of an inch of lean to three or four feet of fat, to the small and delicate specimens, at which the lips of Charles Lamb might have smacked as he described the origin of roast pork. The horses, too, were in great force, including several fine thoroughbreds and hunters, as well as those intended for the cart or the plough. Though not competing for prizes, some miniature horses were shown, which excited much attention and amusement. One exhibitor had a pair of shelties the highest of which was less than three feet, but perfect in every way. These ponies improve in Canada, the woolly nature of the hair appearing to give way under the shelter of the roof, very little of which they enjoy on their native hills.

THE PNEUMATIC DESPATCH TUBE.

THE system of conveyance by atmospheric propulsion through a tube, which was lately exhibited in the grounds of the Crystal Palace, and had previously been tried on the short experimental line at Battersea, as well as in the neighbourhood of the Euston-square station, in Seymour-street and Eversholt-street, Camden Town, has now obtained an important practical extension by the opening of the line from Euston-square to Holborn—a distance of one mile and three quarters—whence it will be continued another mile eastward to the General Post Office, St. Martin's-le-Grand. The premises, No. 245, Holborn, which are the present terminus of the line are well worthy of a visit of inspection.

Entering from the level of the street, the visitor passes along a corridor through a doorway, and emerges upon a gallery of considerable size, from which he looks down on a brick floor, supporting lines of rails, much as he might do from a railway platform down on to the line, but from a greater elevation. Underneath the corridor by which he has just entered he sees some mechanical appliances, suggestive partly of an engine-room and partly of a pointsman's gallery outside a railway station; and below the level, again, on which the white-jacketed engineer in charge is standing, and supporting the platform on which both he and these mechanical appliances rest, are a couple of openings, looking like black, polished modern chimney-pieces, with the grates withdrawn. These are the mouths of the pneumatic tubes, of which one communicates with the North-Western Railway, the other, idle at present, will soon be drawing in and delivering mail-bags from and to the postal head-quarters in London. The mouth of each tube is shut evenly, but at an angle projecting outwards, so as to resist the atmospheric pressure from without. These doors are made to fly open on the approach of the train, the bolt which closes them being withdrawn by the action of a spring lever, which under lies the rails, and gives way beneath the weight of the train. The carriages are shaped like a capital D turned over on its straight side and mounted upon wheels. Each end of the carriage has a raised hood, or flange, shaped so as to correspond with the interior of the tube, the dimensions of which are 4ft. in height by 4 ft. 6 in. in width. Their ordinary freight is expected to be in the first instance letter-bags, then probably railway parcels, certain descriptions of market produce, and ultimately, it may be, general merchandise.

On the opening day the Duke of Buckingham, chairman of the Pneumatic Despatch Company, had invited a number of scientific gentlemen to inspect the apparatus. After the train had made some successful passages to and fro, several of the party expressed a strong desire to pass through the tube themselves. They were warned that the line was "not constructed with a view to passenger traffic," and that they might find the way "a little rough." The spirit of adventure, however, prompted them to take this strange journey, and each of the waggons had soon as many occupants as it could comfortably accommodate in the recumbent posture enforced by circumstances. Tarpaulin coverings were obtained for one or two of the carriages, but the greater number of the excursionists had to fit themselves in as best they could among the bags of shingle, which made up the temporary loading, taking care to keep their heads well below the edge of the carriages.

"The sensation at starting, and still more so upon arriving (say some of the passengers), was not agreeable. For about a quarter of a minute in each case there was a pressure upon the ears suggestive of diving-bell experience, a suction like that with which one is drawn under a wave, and a cold draught of wind upon the eyes, having almost the effect of falling water; but, once motion had little more positive discomfort about it than would be attendant on riding on a 'lorry' over the worst ballasted line in England." The air flavour of rust was encountered, but this was explained by the fact that, as the tube had to be laid in lengths, through various soils, and encountered in the process a large share of unfavourable weather, the corrosion on the surface of the iron could not be expected wholly to disappear until cleared away by the friction of constantly passing and repassing trains. On the arrival of the excursionists at the upper or Euston-square extremity of the line, they quitted their places for a few moments to inspect the smaller tube, which communicates with the Eversholt-street district post-office, and then returned by the way they had come to Holborn.

No doubt remained on the mind of any person who witnessed the opening trip as to the facilities which the system, if a sufficient number of stations can be incorporated with it, is calculated to afford, not only to the postal service, but to the requirements of the general public. The scheme of the company, who, it seems, possess under their Act powers to lay down pneumatic tubes at any points within the jurisdiction of the Metropolitan Board of Works, is to construct similar lines to that now opened between the ten district post-offices and the General Post Office, and between the different railway termini and goods depôts in London, connecting with these lines the six principal London markets and other important points. For these purposes it is calculated that some thirty-five miles of tubing and a capital of £1,750,000 will be required, the cost per mile roughly estimated being from £36,000 to 85,000. The expenditure of the company hitherto has been probably £150,000, which would be largely in excess of this supposed average; but the sum mentioned includes Parliament. The company expect that great profits will eventually accrue to them from the carriage of goods.

THE NEW GYMNASIUM IN MYRTLE-STREET, LIVERPOOL.

THE NEW GYMNASIUM AT LIVERPOOL.

THE social and judicious speech of Lord Stanley at the opening of the new gymnasium, in Myrtle-street, Liverpool, on Monday week, has been generally quoted, and may recommend the practice of healthy and invigorating bodily exercises to the youth of other cities and towns. His Lordship referred to the fact that the institution which they were called upon to inaugurate owed its existence to the energy of his friend Mr. Melly, who, aided by a few supporters, had raised the sum of £10,000, required for its construction. The total cost had been £11,000, but of this £4000 had been raised on mortgages; the remainder was raised by shares. The yearly expenses would be £1000, which, there was no doubt, would be obtained, since the returns for the first six months were £500. We present to our readers a plan and an interior View of the new building. The site, containing 1,450 yards, is in Myrtle-street, one of the most central parts of the town, was purchased on lease. The design of Mr. Walter Scott was selected, a contract was taken by Messrs. Nicholson and Ayre for £7000, and the foundation stone was laid by Alderman Wilson on the 18th of July, 1861, by Mr. Charles Melly, then Mayor. The building, as it now stands, is of most handsome and substantial character, and of admirable proportions. The area occupied is 1450 square yards. On the ground floor is the entrance hall, 30ft. long, 20ft. wide, and 40ft. high. There is a wide gallery on the first floor, running round the sides of the hall, and also a fine corridor, with a range of arched arms, in which Mr. Durbee, a skilled swordsman of acknowledged reputation, will hold joint dominion with Mr. Jem Mace, whose ability with the gloves no one will be inclined to dispute. In addition to these, there are dressing-rooms, lavatories, and bath-rooms for both sexes, and private apartments for the medical officials, &c. As to the apparatus, if we say that it has been supplied regardless of expense, enough said—a backward glance at the plan will prove the fact. The large hall presents to the eye an array of ladders, bars, ropes, and nets, which for the uninitiated is rather bewildering. Visitors will be taken through the whole building (says the Liverpool Mercury), and were undergoing a course with everything explained to them. Besides the known number of athletic sports and exercises, under whose superintendence these arrangements have been completed, we have had extensive experience both in England and on the Continent; and we may safely say that everything that can be accomplished gymnast may desire will here be found. The institution has been long wanted for some weeks, and we are pleased to observe that over 600 members are already enrolled. The ladies' classes, for the present, are limited, for the day, have been so far very successful, and promise to be still more so. The classes may be held of the following kinds:—The large hall is an open space, wherein a considerable number of pupils may be exercised at one time. The use of the hall and gallery at eight o'clock in the evening, when the classes commence, is a most animated and exciting scene. Here are to be seen 200 finely-built athletes, with iron muscle and unflinching nerve observable in every movement, here, there, and everywhere, and all performing some feat of grace or strength. One, with the head massage in his hand, runs up the rigging with an agility that many an old tar might envy; a few minutes beyond youth is wielding gracefully a pair of heavy clubs; and there, again, a little knot of competitors are trying to outdo each other in performing the wonderful feats on the bar. In the centre a class, under the direction of Mr. Hulley, are undertaking the more light and graceful of gymnastic movements, which in unison have a very pretty effect. Everywhere there is activity, and scores of lads, as the hour of nine draws near, are dragged well for the benefit. By the courtesy of Mr. Hulley, ladies and gentlemen were admitted on Saturday to the gallery; and we are sure that all who pay the gymnasium a visit will agree with us that they have been gratified with what they have seen, and that they will do all they can to make the institution a success.

CLOSE OF THE DUBLIN EXHIBITION.

THE International Exhibition of 1862 at Dublin was formally closed on Thursday, the 30th inst., in the presence of a brilliant assemblage. At one o'clock the bands of all the regiments in Dublin marched in and played alternately until three o'clock, when the ceremonial of the day began, and took place in the large concert-hall, where chairs were placed on the orchestra for the accommodation of visitors, while other persons were to take part in it. On the platform, in front, seats were arranged for the Duke of Leinster, the Lord Mayor, distinguished personages. At three o'clock the chair was taken by the Duke of Leinster, among those present were the Right Hon. Lord Chancellor, the Archbishop of Dublin, Lord Otho Fitzgerald, Lord Bathurst; the Hon. Mr. Hare, the Hon. James Wilson, Mr. Bruen, Mr. Bart, Alderman Campbell, Mr. Dargan, Sir W. Wilde, Sir Robert Kane, Sir Benjamin Burke, the Right Hon. Joseph Napier (late Lord Chancellor), the Hon. Mr. Langdale, Major-General Colomb; Sir Joseph Paxton, Bart.; Sir Reginald Graham, Bart.; Sir John Lentaigne, Esq., D.L.; Dr. Waller, Mr. Corballis, Y. W. Beatty, Esq., Q.C., and a host of other fashionables, including many ladies of distinction.

Mr. Charles Edward Bagot, secretary of the executive committee, read a report, which gave a history of the exhibition from its beginning, progress, and conclusion. The exhibition, from his statement, appears to have been in the main a success; and, as only will all expenses be covered, but the company which has created the building to form a permanent winter garden will be able to pay a dividend of 5 per cent stipulated rent at which it let the premises. The Exhibition was open 159 days and 21 evenings, and the entire number of admissions on every kind was a little over 900,000, being an average of about 5000 by day and of 3000 by night.

When the secretary had ended his statement a musical selection was performed, after which the Lord Mayor proposed and Mr. Whiteside seconded a vote of thanks to the executive committee, which was passed with acclamation. Mr. Francis William Brady acknowledged the compliment on the part of the executive. The Duke of Leinster moved a vote of thanks to the exhibitors, and his Grace the Archbishop of Dublin (Dr. Fench) seconded the motion in a few appropriate and classic taste and elegance, which told with much effect on the assembly. The resolution was put, and carried with acclamation.

Sir Bernard Burke then came forward and said:—"On a previous occasion, by the command of his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, acting on behalf of her Most Gracious Majesty the Queen, I had the honour to announce the opening of this magnificent building. The executive committee have now requested me to perform another and a less agreeable duty, to declare this great and brilliant exhibition—which in the name of the queen of the British empire I opened on the 1st, with all its attractions, which have, during the last six months, so illustrated and delighted us. In this duty, like the executive committee, I declare the Dublin International Exhibition of 1865 closed."

The band were having taken the second chair, the Right Hon. Joseph Napier moved to return thanks to the Duke of Leinster, "Ireland's own Duke," he said, "who has so contributed much to the prosperity of Ireland and the happiness of its people, and who was ever ready to come forward to assist in every good and useful work." Sir Robert Shaw seconded the resolution, which was passed with enthusiasm. The ensemble and deservedly popular Duke rose, and a thunder of applause and repeated cheers for Mr. Levey, and elsewhere did deep emotion.

Then followed the performance by all the bands massed together of a triumphal march composed for the occasion by Mr. Levey, and with it the ceremonial concluded.

The Journal de Bruxelles states that the people of that city having determined to abolish free eating repasts in consequence of the high price to which they have risen, that check in the consumption of the cheese is to be reduced from 10l. the hundred to 5l.

A new scot has lately sprung up in Berlin. Its members call themselves "The Captains." Dr. Edward Lowental, the founder, has published a book stating the principles which he calls a religion without a confession. The Captains also have their magazine, bearing the following motto:—"Our knowledge is our faith; our faith is our knowledge; our worship is life; and our religion be—our secret." A few of their doctrines and practices are as follow:—Neither theft nor fraud can be punished by imprisonment. Women are to have a part in the church government. Only the lower part of a coffin should be buried in the earth. All good Captains are to have a good dinner for nothing, and also in public, on Christmas Day, Easter Sunday, and Whit-Sunday. The head of the Captains is to wear a black combed cock, with upright collar, and three silver stars on it.

MEMBERS OUT OF PARLIAMENT.

THE electoral entertainments, which are abnormally prevalent just now, have been in a manner customary in the city of Oxford. There are annual banquets, more than one, in that famous town at which the members for the borough are paraded, and at which the angelarities of political opposition are, as it were, hidden under the flowers and decorations of the festive table. At the same time the constituency, which must have a good knowledge of the genius dog, has been fortunate enough to be represented by somewhat dissimilar animals: a member of the Cabinet, who is at length a Secretary of State, and a member who, as far as a first-class Fellow can be called so, of the University, may be accepted as personages who make a distinct marked in the political world.

The recent appearance of Mr. Cardwell at one of the usual festive meetings, and his speech on the constitution of the Ministry, just after the loss of the late Premier, was suggestive of the position which that right hon. gentleman occupies on the Treasury bench, and especially in regard to the leadership of the House of Commons in the place of Lord Palmerston. Mr. Gladstone will be seen considerably ventilated. The idea, however, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in the event, Mr. Gladstone will stand almost, if not entirely, alone, unless by a relinquishment of office, he can secure one or two colleagues to support him. It would seem that Sir George Grey and, still more, Sir Charles Wood are not popular with the House, and, as regards the former, right honourable gentleman, he was, in the earlier days of the Whig ministry in office, one of the smartest of Parliamentary tinkers, and up to the present time is a most effective speaker, on the rare occasions allowing powers of attack and capabilities of defence which, when he was younger, he possessed in a greater degree than now in the midst of party disputation. But there has been also an entire change, as a matter of fact, in the House. Nobody wishes as debaters, which may be attributed to a notion that both these gentlemen, on the one hand, are rather the functionaries of their departments to be anxious to tilt in the general tourney of debate, and, on the other, that they have been allowed a certain exemption from their Parliamentary duty granted to them. Now, however, an opportunity has been given to them to prove their mettle in this respect. Although troubled with a certain heavy, swinging, and unwieldy style of speaking, Mr. Cardwell has many qualities which might make him very useful—not merely, so to speak, as a debater in the rough and debate, but as an active assailant. He is ready enough, fluent regular and methodical in his arrangement of a speech, and has a tendency which often characterised the late Sir Robert Peel, and which, as one of the leaders of the party, Mr. Lowe has also shown and adopted in all its integrity. His defect—and it caused his failure as Irish Secretary—is that he has not the same kind of energy, when he shows any, seems the result of ponderous effort, and there is always a suspicion that he is not over anxious to appear to feel most. In short, there is apparently no desire on his part that he should have to go fast his pace is only a canter, and exactly the factitious speed at which he is accustomed to be seen if, in case of need, he can go straight across country. As to Mr. Charles Wood, he is, as he used, an able man of business, and but he bears the reputation of being lazy and careless of distinguishing for himself in the House of Commons, consequently he is not a despondently possesses. Escaping from what must be excused as a long parenthesis, and which is perhaps a little tedious, it is to be hoped that, on the particular occasion to which we wish to refer, Mr. Cardwell displayed qualities which are not generally supposed to be of seeming to be intensely oracular; and his colleague, Mr. Neate, set up a standard in the office of the Department of the Secretary for the Colonies, and talked of the prospects of the future as a Minister who had not consulted Almighty in a shake-of-the-head and I-could-an-if-I-would style that would do credit to a Pitt. This is probably Mr. Neate's way, but he always seems as if he were afraid that his Radicalism were an abstract forfeiture of his Conservative status, and that he must endeavour by going over from town to town, which, practically, he has done.

It is believed that the Government will not be long in the ground pointing but contrivances by the last election; but here and there an isolated exception to the rule may be made, as a matter of course. One of the successes, which no one denies, is that of Mr. Ayrton, a Liberal, who appears to pride himself on the title of a yeoman and tenant-farmer of Tooting. Mr. Ayrton, as it is represented in the county by the family of Coke. Since 1837, a brother of the latter, Mr. Wenman Coke, a little over a year ago, of Norfolk who held for so long the rank of the first commoner of Leicestershire, Mr. Ayrton, as it is said, was called amongst his tenantry directing them to vote for his brother; and, as the Reginald Graham, Bart., of Norfolk, who held, an agriculturist, in the best sense of the term, was induced to stand for the Northern division of the county, to come into Parliament in a peculiar character, representing specially and personally the tenant-right interest, is not so very Conservative as the country gentleman who are generally the members for the shires. Mr. Ayrton, as Mr. Ayrton, is a Liberal, his character and position as an agriculturist is to be found in the fact that he is a practical farmer, and not one who is only a theoretical one for inquiring into the causes of, and remedies for, the cattle plague; and in what manner he will act in Parliament upon the matter from the circumstance that the Earl of Leicester, as Lord Lieutenant, is Chairman of the Board of Agriculture, and Mr. Ayrton a Deputy Lieutenant. Mr. Read has been lately entertained by his constituents, and compared to Cincinnatus, which the good sense and modesty which no doubt are characteristic of him.

The sectional division which was to determine the fate of the Ministry on Friday night, and which was to terminate in a majority, Mr. Ralph Dutton, a Liberal Conservative, went into the country with Lord Palmerston's Government, and, in connection with several other members of his party who were supposed to be influenced by the same motive, left Mr. Disraeli to support principles. For this latter motive Mr. Dutton could not obtain relief from his constituents, and he has little cause to regret the formal notice to quit their representation. Having family and property connections in Herefordshire he came out as the Tory which Cirencester is situated, Mr. Dutton presented himself to the electors as a Liberal elector, and, in connection with Mr. Bathurst, the former member, he sought the suffrages of the Men of Cirencester. Mr. Goldsmid—with success. As a Liberal seat was thus lost, it was but fair that a Liberal should be returned, and accordingly Mr. Bathurst and Mr. Dutton appeared at the feast as a new member, and delivered what was termed, in the language of a political reporter, a speech. It was easy for him to insinuate that, the moving cause of his wavering in the House of Commons was his personal regard for the old chief Palmerston, he was not likely to fall into temptation again, and he all opposition. Here he could not avoid a compliment to the late Derby enunciated by Mr. Bathurst, who contrived, in the course of the evening, to make his own status which he quoted, to put his political chief in a very queer aspect before his constituents.

The circumstances of the north of England do not often interchange with their members of the south, and the Northern division of the county to encompass them with their voices only, and the pledges that they have given them are not considerable and alarming in the wine-cup. But the other day the electors of Shields drank to Mr. Ingham, their member, in a bumper of water with four eyes. Twenty-five persons out of Shields ever heard who was the member for that borough, and the constituency considerable and alarming to him in the house which consists of the peculiarly business men. They, however, will know Mr. Ingham in future, as he has made a considerable figure one of the best of chairmen of committees of all kinds, an expert in all questions of private business, and one who is also engrafted, with the greatest advantage to the proceedings of the House, the sound lawyer on the working member. Although not, we believe, having any buccle belongings, and being town-and lawyer-bred, Mr. Ingham would be taken from his appearance to be the beau ideal of the conventional country gentleman, ruddy and rotund, and with an air of the most intense respectability. He has long represented Shields, and no one dreamt of opposing him at the last election, and, therefore, it could only be an effusion of good-will towards a member who gains for the borough a certain mark and character in the house which brought him and the electors together over the festive board. There was nothing to excuse and explain; and if Mr. Ingham, in making his inevitable speech, had said, simply, "I am one of the foremost of the business members," he would have indicated a claim to remembered which is that high political knowledge the impetus to the requirement of which is political ambition.

SPORTSMEN AS THEY WERE AND AS THEY ARE.

THE STEEPLECHASE.—FOX-HUNTING.

WHAT a contrast is there in appearance between the sportsmen of the last century and those of the present day. In what way we now look for the brown-topped boot and the yellow leather breeches! Where have gone drabbets and grey drabbets, and grey frieze to Napoleon boots and Wellington trousers that dangle like a bunch of calcium while standing at the coverts side on a crisp morning; are the chief features of our modern Nimrods. Amongst the gentlemanly ranks of bygone "turns-out," which are now as completely gone out of fashion as the "first and second tie" of our youth, the buck must, may be mentioned the leather girdle, which went round in the middle—a practice which necessitated wearing the waistcoat in its tie proper place. The saddle sat more closely on the back, there, was greater freedom in the use of the legs, and prevention of that friction which arises from the one at present in use. Stirrups were large in circumference, and of a proportionate weight, by which much of that toe-kicking which is practised to-day was avoided. Spurs were not worn. How different, too, were the domiciliary arrangements! In those days a good kitchen fire sat six in the morning, a splendid cold breakfast of beef or venison pasty, besides a draught of old October (a bohea) constituted the morning preparation for the chase. Thus fortified, the cavalcade sallied forth at seven, and, finding their fox by the dawn's early light, was on his track before our modern fast hunting gentry are out of their beds, and to whom the old stave,

> "The sun has risen and the day
> Is breaking fast upon us then,"

would be chanted in a most unmusical manner.

The cock's shrill clarion or the echoing horn
No more shall rouse them from their lowly bed.

It is thought quite time enough, nowadays, to reach the cover side by the above o'clock, where, probably, the poor clipped bits of blood have to stand about shivering for half an hour or more before reynard may think it proper to make his appearance. When that is ultimately accomplished, and he has had an even chance through the impatience of our modern sportsmen, he is headed back to cover, by hovvers, by dogs, by whips, by all the hunting gang, and by dint of nobbing, and shouting, and lifting, he is generally quietly put on his best hand an hour.

And here we will take the opportunity of saying a few words on the subject of hunting generally. How truly has the author of an interesting and useful work called "The Horse in Motion" said, "The steeplechase is a relic of ancient foolhardiness and cruelty!" It is the form under which hunting existed in the first century, was frequently decided. It is a race across the country of two or four, or even more, miles in length, as the case may be, and, considered that there should be some deep lane or wide brook, and many a stiff and dangerous fence between the start and the finish, evident hazard of the life of the sportsman; and it likewise puts to great the life of many a valuable hunter. Another talented writer remarks, "I am well aware that the observations I am about to offer may not be palatable to many gentlemen who pursue this recreation; nor are they desirous to have the fact of its sadness quotheyed in a manner, but to be pain, it is true colours, the barbarous abuse to which he is in this instance subjected, and which is, for the most part, of gain." It might be supposed that a moment's reflection would point out to the thoughtless and unfeeling the loneliness and misery over a country without one cheering accompaniment to beguile the labour of the undertaking. But, no, the poor brute is to be made a source relief to the animal, and afford him the opportunity of recovering his breath. Not so, however, is the case. There, a distance of four or five miles is selected, over which the poor beast is ridden, and, as a matter of course, by way of regaining his wind, except by a beating of his sides with the spurs of his cruel master. Such is one of the descriptive takes more out of a horse than the hunting of a whole season.

Upon this subject, however, we will no longer dwell. We are friends to hunting, and to everything that is very close, but sincerely and sincerely do we trust that, while the true old British sports may long flourish in our land, every effort will be made to prevent the abuse of barbarity, such as cock-fighting, bull-baiting, dog-fighting, and steeplechasing, may be put down, as they are, by the strong hand of the law, at least by the good feeling of the sporting community.

As fox-hunting has begun, it may not be out of place to offer a few remarks in connection with it. Hunting, as a "noble science," as it has been aptly called, is a truly national amusement. It is one that tends to the improvement of the gentleman who is to live upon their estates, to improve the breed of horses, and to circulate a vast amount of money among the people. Such finds its way to the pockets of the breakers of horses and the cultivators of land.

In forming a pack of hounds the greatest attention should be paid to the following rules:—Hounds should combine strength with beauty, and headstrong with high mettle. They should be of shape essential to short backs, open breasts, straight legs, and compact feet. The first-rate qualities of hounds are fine noses, sharp tongues, steadiness to their game, and stoutness in chase. If fragrant propensities discover themselves in a hound, he should be shot at once. Do not walk your hounds amongst rot (i.e., lanes and deer) in the summer, and fox-hounds in the winter. Hounds are not plenty, at least two months before the regular season begins. Performance in hounds is the only test by their hard running, good scent, and patient hunting with a bad one, together with invincible stoutness, when pressed. Do not be deceived by appearance, by overrunning the scent, and babbling. Never breed from a hound that cannot hunt a fox, and run with him in all other respects. A hound that is surely descend to his or her produce. Do not lift your hounds when they are at fault, until you are satisfied that they require it; but encourage them to take pains, and keep your field aloof, and, if possible, from the hounds, and never ride over the scent. Let them be cast in two lots—the head whipper-in taking hold of one, and the huntsman of the other. When a fox breaks cover, avoid too much halloing: it makes hounds wild, and often runs them off the scent. The more quietly you can turn hounds the better; if they are too free with their rating and their whips hounds will soon be unsteady and run riot, and be difficult to get back. When hounds are going to cry let them be encouraged, not stopped, for then they will be checked. If a hound is slow or is readily to cry, he had better be draughted at once. It is essential to sport that hounds should get quickly to cry, or a good head cannot be carried by them in the burst, which generally ends in killing three, or at "blood," as the term is. The wildest pack of hounds have been known to kill the same fox three days a-week and meeting them in covers, while they have seldom killed a really good fox in a month's regular hunting. Murdering foxes is never an absurd practice. Seasoned foxes are an essential to sport as seasoned hounds.

A meeting was held at the Corn Exchange, Chester, last Saturday, to consider a proposal for erecting a memorial to the late Marquis of Westminster. Mr. Wilbraham Egerton took the chair. Resolutions were passed unanimously in favour of the meeting in forwarding the object. At this preliminary stage of the proceedings the amount collected is upwards of £1000.

The Paris Board of Index, as the official censors are called, having been applied to for the stamp to authorise the sale of a translation into French of Thackeray's "Memoirs of an English Valet," refused it for the following judicious reason:—"Because the book contains strictures on the English aristocracy of such intense severity that remembrance of Her Majesty's Government might be the consequence of its authorised circulation."

OBITUARY OF ELIMENT PERSONS.

LADY THERESA LEWIS.

Lady Maria Theresa Lewis, an agreeable and successful writer and a lady greatly esteemed for her intellect, amiable manners, and benevolence, was the only daughter of the Hon. George Villiers, by his wife, Theresa, only daughter of John, first Lord Boringdon, and was granddaughter of Thomas, first Earl of Clarendon, and sister of the Right Hon. Sir George William Frederick Villiers, K.G., fourth and present Earl of Clarendon, Secretary of State for the Foreign Department. Her Ladyship was born March 7, 1807, and was married, first, Nov. 6, 1830, to Thomas Henry Lister, Esq., of Armitage Park, Yorkshire, who published a literary romance, entitled "Granby," and several other novels, and who died in 1842. She was married, secondly, in 1848, to the Right Hon. Sir George Cornewall Lewis, M.P., C.B., the eminent statesman and author, who died April 13, 1863. Lady Theresa Lewis was an able, industrious, and varied contributor to literature. Her two novels, "The Semi-Detached House" and "The Semi-Attached Couple," were very popular; and her "Lives of the Queens of England, after the Norman Conquest," and her "Lives of Eminent Foreigners," interesting family portraits at the seat of Lord Clarendon, The Grove, Watford, were valuable biographical works. Her last literary production, published after the death of her husband, was a translation of "The Letters of Madame de Sévigné, to her Daughter and Friends," which was published in 1862, in three volumes, and was received with much favour by the public. Lady Theresa Lewis was also the author of "The Last Chronicle of Carlton House Street," a Christmas book; and in 1859 she brought out "Ballads." Mrs. Gaskell was a contributor to Lady Theresa Lewis's "Lays of Ancient Rome," and other prominent of her stickers there being some sketches of life in a village, under the title of "Cousin Phillis." In 1857 she published anonymously, "Lays of her friend Charlotte Brontë. Charles Kingsley, another friend, wrote "Hypatia," and "Yeast," and Miss Sewell, "Amy Herbert," "Ursula," "Second Thoughts," "Night and Morning," and numerous contributions to the periodicals of the day.

M. DUPIN, AINÉ.

Andrew Marie John James Dupin, a celebrated French lawyer, advocate, and politician, known as "M. Dupin, aîné," to distinguish him from his two brothers, all distinguished men—the two younger being Baron Charles Dupin, civil engineer, the engineer and mathematician, and Baron Dupin, the advocate deceased. They were the sons of M. Dupin, a member of the first Legislative Assembly, who suffered from the revolutionary fever but his life during the Reign of Terror. Andrew, the eldest, the subject of this notice, was born 1783, and was called to the bar in the parliament of his Native, then part of the province of Nivernais. He was educated by the Oratorians, and afterwards at the Lycée Henri IV. at Paris, and was admitted to the Bar in 1809, at the age of seventeen, an unusually early age for the profession in France. He soon distinguished his efforts in the newly-created profession of advocate, and in 1812 his talents attention more particularly to his profession as a practising barrister, and, from the history of his language, his fame as an orator. His great forte was lucidity of his understanding, he soon acquired a great reputation. He was a member of Representative Assemblies for his native town, a town of Nivere, for a short time in 1815, and then formed part of the Liberal Opposition. He became, however, to be one of the leaders of the party under the second return of Louis XVIII. Under the Restoration he became the intrepid defender, before the tribunals of many political victims, by the Government. He, with M. Berryer, in that and historic epoch, the trial of Marshal Ney, defended the unfortunate Marshal, and was present at the last interview which he had with his friends at the Conciergerie, on the day of his death, and before he mounted the stage of his execution. Another famous process followed, when Dupin defended with a pleasantry rendered necessary by the trial of Benjamin Constant, Sir Robert Wilson, Mr. Hutchinson (afterwards Earl of Donoughmore), and Mr. Brown, who were in their chivalrous defence—fraternising and assisting the French frontier M. Lavalette, when the devotion of a wife had set free from his condemned cell. Their trivial evidence, there accused of treason, was looked on as a victory; and even this sentence Louis XVIII (who, to his honour, was suspected of secretly favouring the escape) refused to remitted for an apology, but they refused to make it. M. Dupin also defended in the legal proceedings instituted against the Duchess of the Duke de Vicence. In fact, in all the political trials of the time Dupin was employed as counsel for the accused. In 1817 he published a work, He was counsel for all the important political and literary prosecutions, amongst them being the Jolie, for an article that made considerable noise at his period. Those legal writings procured for Dupin an immense popularity. In 1819 he refused to accept from the Government the post of Secretary-General to the Ministry of Justice, with the annual salary of 40,000f., and the prospect of an appointment as Councillor of State. He was, in 1828, elected Bâtonnier (or head) of the Order of Advocates of Paris. In the same time, however, he had, in 1817, re-entered the Chamber of Representatives as Deputy for Nievre, representing part of Sarre, and took his seat in the Left Centre. He warmly opposed the Polignac Ministry, but evinced some hesitation in the revolution of July. He, however, took the oath of allegiance to the new dynasty, and he it was who bespeaker Louis Philippe the title of "King of the French," instead of "King of France," as the Duke de Chartres wished. On that occasion he made some remarks: "The Duke of Orleans is called to the throne, not because, but in spite of his being a Bourbon." Dupin was forthwith made Procureur-Général to the Court of Cassation, and showed himself one of the firmest and most sensible supporters of the Orleanist dynasty. He even on one occasion, in their favour risked his life from the fury of a mob. He was elected President of the Chamber in 1832, and, during the eight years which followed, occupied the same post at different intervals. He was also also included in the majority of Ministerial commissions of the time, but to declined invitations to accept office both in 1840 and 1848. At the revolution of 1848 it was Dupin who presented the Count de Paris to the Chamber as King, and it was he who proposed the Regency. After the coup d'état that Dupin still maintained his post of Procureur-Général. He laboured actively, for the sake of order, in the Assemblies of 1848 and 1849, and he appointed President of the Committee of Legislation. On the 4th of December he supported the home and foreign policy of Louis Napoleon; and, in addition, approved of the Decree of 22nd January, which then elected President of the National Assembly, of which he was a member for his native department of the Nievre. At the age of seventy-seven, he was only reigned on the decree confiscating the property of the Orleans family. He died, as he returned, at the wish of the Emperor, from the Procureur-Général in the Court of Cassation. M. Dupin was the author of numerous legal and other works. His principal work is his "Manuel du Droit," a very enormous. He was for nearly thirty years a Knight Grand Cross of the Legion of Honour. M. Dupin died on the 7th inst., after an illness of consumption.

WILLS AND BEQUESTS.

The will of the Right Hon. Sir Fitzroy Kelly, late Attorney-General, was proved, in her Majesty's Court of Probate, by the Rev. Henry H. Hutchinson, the Right Hon. Fitzroy Kelly, Miss Wodehouse (daughter of Lord Wodehouse), and solicitor, Lincoln's-inn-fields, the executors. The personalty was sworn under £30,000. The will, dated the 9th of October, 1863, with a codicil thereto, was twice married, first to M. O. Moore, Esq., and secondly, in 1825, to the late Right Hon. Richard Hussey Lord Fitzgerald and Vesey, by whom Lady Kelly died on the 29th of September last, having executed her will on the 25th of the same month. She bequeaths to her husband, Sir Fitzroy Kelly, the greater part of the household pictures between her daughters, Lady Dillon and Lady Wodehouse, and leaves the residue of her property to be divided between them and the children of her daughter Lady Barrington. She also bequeaths to each of her three surviving legacies of £200 each.

The will of the late Admiral Sir John Clayton, many years the minister of the Presbyterian Church, lately residing at Bath, and previously of Brighton, was proved in London, on the 26th ult., by the Rev. Thomas Archer, Esq., of Walton, and William Hunter, Esq., of North-end, Croydon, the acting executors and trustees. John Carling, Esq., of Denmark-hill, Camberwell, the residuary legatee. The personalty was sworn under £30,000. The testator died, on the 3rd of October last, at the age of eighty-five. The will is dated February, 1860, and there are two codicils, one dated March, 1860, and the other January, 1863. He has bequeathed to his son, Edward Clayton, a legacy of £4000 (New Three per Cents); to his orphan granddaughter, Sarah Ellis Clayton, £3000; to his daughter Sarah, wife of Alfred Rastall, £6000; to his daughter Mary, wife of Thomas Hunter, £6000 by the will and £4000 by the codicil of 1863; and has appointed his said two daughters residuary legatees of his entire estate, real and personal. There are a few small legacies. To the British and Foreign Bible Society, the British and Foreign School Society, and the London Missionary Society, each a legacy of 19 gr., and to each of his executors, £50. There are also legacies to his servants, and to a Mrs. Fox an annuity of £15, in addition to an annuity of £20 left to her under the will of the testator's wife.

The will of the Rev. John Greenwood, D.D., Rector of Colne Engaine, Essex, who has been elected in London, by his son, George Henry Greenwood, of the Red Tile Office, the absolute Chancellor, power being restored to the Rev. John W. Ley, his son-in-law. The personalty was sworn under £12,000. He bequeaths £100 each to the Royal Asylum of Christ's Hospital (or Bluecoat School), and was presented to the living of Colne Engaine, in 1827, by the executors of the late Joseph Hughes, Esq., and was instituted on the 4th of December, 1863. Dr. Greenwood attained the age of seventy-nine, and died on the 14th of October, 1863. He was the author of "Sermons," 1833; "Family Prayers," 1834; "Sermons," 1839; "Sermons on the Parables," 1841; and "Sermons on the Miracles," 1843; and has left behind him a widow, and two daughters, one of whom is married to the Rev. John W. Ley, and the other is unmarried.

The will of Mr. Thomas Greenwood, J.P., of Broomfield, Todmorden, and of Manchester, who died on the 19th ult., was proved in Manchester, by Joseph Greenwood, Esq., of Broomfield, and Thomas Greenwood, Esq., of Manchester, the executors. The personalty was sworn under £250,000. The will, dated the 9th of October, 1863, was twice married, first to M. O. Moore, Esq., and secondly, in 1825, to the late Right Hon. Richard Hussey Lord Fitzgerald and Vesey, by whom Lady Kelly died on the 29th of September last, having executed her will on the 25th of the same month. She bequeaths to her husband, Sir Fitzroy Kelly, the greater part of the household pictures between her daughters, Lady Dillon and Lady Wodehouse, and leaves the residue of her property to be divided between them and the children of her daughter Lady Barrington. She also bequeaths to each of her three surviving legacies of £200 each.

The will of the late Alderman Farncomb was proved in the London Court, on the 26th ult., by the surviving executors, William Bruce, Esq., and Henry Simon Bruce, Esq., the sons-in-law of the deceased, and was sworn under £140,000. The will appears to have been made in the year of his hospitality, being that immediately after the Lord Mayor's Show. Lord Mayor, Thomas Farncomb," and bears date Sept. 25, 1860; and there are two codicils, 1864 and 1861. The testator died, on the 31st of May, at his residence, Rose Hill, Forest-hill, Surrey, at the age of eighty-six, a bachelor. He carried on business as a wharfinger and coal merchant, and was formerly partner, consisting of the realtor, he has divided into four parts, leaving one fourth to his nephew Henry, one fourth to his nephew Thomas, and one to the children of his deceased brother John, and the remaining fourth to the children of his deceased sister, Elizabeth Bruce, in equal proportions. To Mr. Bruce, the executor, he has left a legacy of £3000 and the estate at Forest-hill, and to Mr. Henry Simon Bruce, the other executor, £2000. To his clerks in Griffin's Wharf, 10 guineas each; to his servant, Mary Ann Maxfield, £200; also legacies to his servants; and to the Philanthropic Society and the Asylum for Deaf and Dumb Children, £100 each, and other legacies.

The will of the Rev. John Clayton, many years the minister of the Presbyterian Church, lately residing at Bath, and previously of Brighton, was proved in London, on the 26th ult., by the Rev. Thomas Archer, Esq., of Walton, and William Hunter, Esq., of North-end, Croydon, the acting executors and trustees. John Carling, Esq., of Denmark-hill, Camberwell, the residuary legatee. The personalty was sworn under £30,000. The testator died, on the 3rd of October last, at the age of eighty-five. The will is dated February, 1860, and there are two codicils, one dated March, 1860, and the other January, 1863. He has bequeathed to his son, Edward Clayton, a legacy of £4000 (New Three per Cents); to his orphan granddaughter, Sarah Ellis Clayton, £3000; to his daughter Sarah, wife of Alfred Rastall, £6000; to his daughter Mary, wife of Thomas Hunter, £6000 by the will and £4000 by the codicil of 1863; and has appointed his said two daughters residuary legatees of his entire estate, real and personal. M. Schlüter has requested to the Paris Academy of Sciences of Vienna that he has successfully employed the light produced by the combustion of magnesium in the exhibition of the phenomena termed fluorescence, due to the very large amount of chemical rays which it possesses, and which render it efficacious in the operations of photography. He found, by experiment, that dry chloride of silver assumed a blue colour when exposed for a few seconds to the magnesium light; and that platino-cyanide of barium showed great sensitiveness. Several bodies which become phosphorescent after having been exposed to sunlight during eight or ten minutes acquired this property after exposure to the magnesium light for a few seconds only.

M. A. Bechamp, in the conclusion of a note on the physiological substitutive vitality of yeast, read to a recent meeting of the Academy of Sciences at Paris, states that the results of his experiments are contrary to the theories of Liebig and Pasteur, who thought the molecules of ferment, well washed with water, are entirely deprived of their property of acting on sugar. M. Bechamp, on the contrary, asserts that ferment acts on cane-sugar, since it has not ceased to live; and that, when it is so exhausted, it acts on the sugar by the aid of the water. "Thus," he says, "I have seen fresh cane-sugar ferment in a mixture of water and dried fermentation. . . . It ought to be sought in the catalytic action of some chemical compound which it may contain, and which it forms by the assimilation of the sugar to the power of living cell; it is a consequence of the act of the nutrition of the cell." These conclusions are opposed to those of Liebig, who says that "the insoluble body termed ferment does not provoke fermentation."

In the Philosophical Magazine for November Mr. Alfred Bird describes the construction of a cheap water-barometer (at a cost not exceeding 4d.), exclusive of a glass tube, which is 34 in. long. Bird gives a short drawing how much more sensitive the water-barometer is than the mercurial one. Having a stem, as it were, 13 times longer, every change of air is in a remarkable manner, when the mercurial column showed very little oscillation. In this barometer is a portion of the "Mr. Bird" demonstrating the appearance of copper in the mineral kingdom. This metal has been detected in the flesh, blood, and bones of animals, but it has not yet been found to exist in all other animals where it was sought for. As animals live in part, directly or indirectly, on vegetables, it is probable that copper will be found to exist in vegetables from which animals feed, and copper must be found in the plants used as medicinal purposes. This has been proved by the researches of Meissner, Cumaille, Durocher, Boutigny, and Collin. Mr. Bird has also given some instructive papers by Mr. Justice Coltman, and Mr. Cayley, and several papers from foreign journals, which will be found interesting to our columns.

In the Annals of Natural History for November we have, besides the continuation of papers by Mr. Wollaston, Mr. W. C. Hewitson, and others, a note by Dr. Carpenter, in which he defends the zoological character of the Foraminifera, and Mr. Edwin Rimmer communicates the appearance of Professor King. Dr. Samuel Haughton, who lately investigated the structure of the eye of the Cephalopoda, has a paper on the mechanism of the muscular anatomy of the leg of the crocodile, in which the interlacing of the muscular fibres is described. The crocodile, when at rest, progresses chiefly by using his hind feet as paddles, and in this use of them the great conical projection of the heel of the foot materially assists propulsion; not the simultaneity of the action of the leg appears to be fully secured by the above-mentioned interlacing of the tendons. Mr. Alfred Smith, whose name is now permanently connected with the subject, gives a series of descriptions of new species of Coleoptera from the Cape of Good Hope and South Africa. Lastly, Mr. Thwaites has a paper on the new species of Desmids, containing the existence of liquid and solid matters in the trichinon vessels of plants. Among the new species he has to cite one of the genus Closterium, on the surfaces of which, when cast to pieces, were found filaments of gumme matter of the same nature as that which exists in the cells of the larger vessels. Hence it appear that, even at an advanced age, the trachean vessels may contain a considerable amount of substances which subsequently acquire a great density.

In an article "On Gravity and Magnetic Inclination," in the American Journal of Science, Mr. P. E. Chase, after remarking on Father Secchi's observations on the Anomalous hitherto known in the Intratropical magnetic variations may be explained by supposing that the sun acts upon the earth as an electro-magnet, and that the poles of the former attract one of these anomalies, and points out some relations existing between the gravitation currents and the poles of the earth, in reference to the magnetic poles of Saturn. Bache, and others, he finds that the greatest daily disturbance of inclination occurs about the time of the sun's passage of the meridian, and somewhat after the dip is diminished, but at extra-tropical stations it is increased in the middle of the day. Hence, he concludes that the sun's action is to increase the intensity of the inclination forces, and to diminish those of the horizontal. He states that, in regard to the declination, the currents manifest a tendency to follow the line of motion of the sun's apparent motion in the heavens, and that the coldest portions of the globe, the general declination being westerly in the Atlantic and easterly in the Pacific Ocean. We have no room for further remits, but merely tell that, in relation to these questions, Mr. Chase refers to the graphical illustrations of Lieut. Maury's charts. The most important suggestions was to us an occult power, affecting only a few bodies; now it is found to influence all bodies, and to be in direct connection with the electricity, heat, chemical action, light, crystallisation, and, through it, with the forces concerned with gravitation. Of course, we do not pretend to say that the fact urged in continue our labours, encouraged by the hope of bringing it into a head of some general law.

Mr. W. F. Barrett, of the Royal Institution Laboratory, has communicated to the Physical Society a paper on the "Electric Spark," showing physical effects produced by the contact of a hydrogen flame with various bodies. When conducting a series of researches on Faraday's flame, he observed the radiation emitted by various solids heated by means of a hydrogen flame. Mr. Barrett subsequently found that the flame of hydrogen burning in air, when carefully examined, is not entirely free from luminosity, even when dry. Careful examination of this coloration showed that the colour was restricted to the place where the flame impinged on the platinum. In order to isolate the image of the construction of the flame. The blowpipe was proved to be due to no foreign substance in the air. It appeared to be a permanent effect, due to exudation, such as pieces of granite, metal lining, but not on all substances; and a combination of the two experiments, carried out simultaneously, the effects produced, led to no information as to the cause. Mr. Barrett then imagined it to be due to the presence of ozone, and he has since been informed by Professor Stokes. An experiment revealed the source of the phenomenon, and the author found that the coloration was due to the presence of the nitrogen deposited on the surface of the body. As old block of graphite, about the hydrogen flame was applied, showed the blue colour vividly on every part; but, when the flame was applied to the end of the block was thoroughly cleaned, the newly fractured surfaces, not the faintest trace of colour was seen. These experiments have been repeated with various solids, and the phenomena explain either free or in a state of combination, occupies an important place—probably the most important—in the whole of the author's paper which he announces connected with the combustion of hydrogen.

In the Journal of the Chemical Society of the same publication of Society is a paper, by Dr. David Price, on the action of light upon sulphide of lead, which has a tendency to produce a permanent change of colour in certain galenites. His attention was directed to the action of light by observing that, in glass cases which contained a white lead, certain specimens exposed from the substances included did not darken the surface of the case, except where it was protected by the specimens themselves. He has, by a series of careful experiments, which corroborated the statements respecting the injury and preservation of colour, by the action of isolated and isolated substances, and the beneficial effects frequently resulting from the exposure to light of injured specimens. The paper is one of much interest, and we hope to return to it. "Tyne Lea," a paper by Mr. Alfred Smith, on the action of light upon white lead, if not intensely well recured from the effects of the atmosphere, will undergo a change of colour. Mr. Smith has an illustration, and that the changes effected by the secret and chemical process may be brought about by simple exposure to light. Dr. Frankland contributes a paper on the action of sulphide of hydrogen gas until it had acquired a dark brown colour. Strips of paper were then exposed to the influence of light, and to the diffused air a window facing the light. These portions not deserved remained their original appearance, whereas those exposed to the direct rays of the sun. Mr. Cooke, R.A., also has especially remarked the beneficial actions of strong light on air, and the deleterious effects of the absence of light. Mr. Cooke, R.A., also has notes on some of the phosphorescent properties of sulphide of experiments made with the view of ascertaining whether phosphorised copper might not be a substance which would be of use to a medicinal agent.

In the Geological Magazine for November Mr. Leith Adams gives some details of the first discovery of the fossil elephant of Malta, in one of the caverns explored by him in the year 1859. Among the osseous expansions, filled with red earth and stones. In 1857 a portion of a tooth and several vertebræ were found by Mr. Adams, and in 1859 he discovered amidst the propylites and lesse of the quarry clipped and excavated in the limestone rock, the fossil elephant, which he considers to be a probosidian, and, similar to the other fossil remains found in the island, "the property of the ancient and civilised plain of new red sandstone, near the centre of England, rises up a part of the under crust of the earth so as to prevent the appearance of an island, leading the imagination back to those remote ages when its peripteric and its temples and its colossal statues were in their prime. This subject opens up the usual resumé of the proceedings of provincial geological societies and notices of foreign works.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

No. 1344.—VOL. XLVII. SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 25, 1865. WITH SUPPLEMENT, AND LARGE PICTURE OF FLORENCE | FIVEPENCE

INSURRECTION OF NEGROES IN JAMAICA.

IT is impossible to advert to the tidings which have recently come to hand from Jamaica without humiliation and pain. Whatever view we take of the causes to which the outrages at Morant Bay may be traced, the facts reported in the despatch of Governor Eyre cannot fail of awakening throughout the country a thrill of horror. Deeds have been done, both by the insurgents and by the authorities, the bare recital of which makes the blood tingle in our veins. As yet, we are not sufficiently informed to warrant a final judgment on the whole case between the negro peasantry and the ruling class. No doubt searching inquiry will be instituted by her Majesty's Government, and authentic materials will be collected for the guidance of Parliament, whose opinion of what has occurred must inevitably be taken, in some form or another. At the present moment we refrain from presenting to our readers any of the theories according to which partisans seek to justify, or at any rate to excuse, the extreme violence of either side. The time has not come for a judicial survey of the matter. The necessary evidence is wanting. Perhaps, therefore, we shall do well to suppress whatever comment we might be tempted to make on parts of the transactions of which we propose to give a summary account, and confine ourselves strictly to a reproduction, in a condensed form, of the several narratives which have already come before the public.

To render the history intelligible, however, it will be necessary to make two or three statements elucidatory of the peculiar condition of Jamaica as compared with the other West Indian islands under British rule. It is not a Crown colony in the proper sense of the term. It has, and has had ever since the time of Charles II., a Legislature and an official class of its own, the Governor excepted. It contains a vast quantity of waste land, much of which is too poor to produce in any abundance the staple articles of exportation. The northerly half of the island is the most fertile, and in it the negro population is located in the largest proportions. It is unquestionable that in this district the economical legislation of the House of Assembly, and the mode in which justice is administered, have produced some hardship and great discontent among the blacks; but nothing like an insurrectionary spirit had pervaded it up to the time of the outbreak, nor does Governor Eyre's despatch record any facts implicating this larger and more thickly-peopled part of the island. Morant Bay, at the south-eastern corner of Jamaica, washes a poor district not much more than twelve miles square, within which there are negro settlements stricken with poverty, which two years of drought had, of course, tended to aggravate The black inhabitants are many of them Baptists, but are no, under the supervision of the Baptist missionaries, having adopted their faith some years before the latter went to the island, and having maintained their independence of European ministration and control. Owing to this isolation, they have mixed up some of their heathen traditions with Christian truths, and have always evinced more or less of a fanatical spirit.

In the beginning of the present year Mr. Underhill, one of the secretaries of the Baptist Missionary Society, who had recently returned from a tour of inspection in Jamaica, addressed a letter to Mr. Cardwell, the Secretary of the Colonies, calling his attention to the unsatisfactory position of the island, pointing out several things which the black population felt to be grievances, and suggesting some remedial provisions. This letter Mr. Cardwell transmitted to Governor Eyre, with a request that he would report upon the matters contained therein. The Governor published the letter, and invited communications from those whose wisdom or whose official propriety it was understood to impeach. The publication of this document raised great excitement. The Jamaica press was furious in denunciation of it, and, on the other hand, the negroes and their white friends held a number of public meetings, in which, of course, some foolish things were said, but at which professions of loyalty to the Queen were made, and at which professions of loyalty to the Queen, and gratitude to England for the past beneficence, were not uncommon. It was in the midst of this popular political excitement that the lamentable affair at Morant Bay occurred.

A gathering of the peace was to take place on the 7th Oct. 7. There was unseemly noise among the bystanders, and the justice ordered the offending persons to be brought up before him. One of them left the court, but was followed by a side by the police and captured, whereupon he was immediately rescued by the mob. On the following Monday, Oct. 9, a case of trespass was called on. It involved the alleged rights of the whole of the negroes settled at Stoney Gap, close to the plantation on which the trespass was said to have occurred. About a hundred and fifty of these settlers entered the Court, and at the close of the case Paul Bogle, who seems to have acted as their leader, recommended the man convicted not to pay the fine, and to appeal to a higher court, which advice he adopted. The justice, however, who allowed the appeal, forthwith issued warrants for the apprehension of Paul Bogle and twenty-seven others for the riot and rescue before the Stoney Gap to enter the Courthouse. They took no heed of the prohibition, the Riot Act was read, the volunteers fired, and several of the people fell. A simultaneous rush of the crowd was made towards them, and they were overborne and compelled to seek shelter in the Courthouse. Part of the mob then forced the police barracks and helped themselves to arms and ammunition, part smashed the windows of the Courthouse, and, in their attempt to enter it, set it on fire. The atrocities of the next half hour are said to have been indescribable. Two or three of the persons who were within the building were spared, the rest were either cut down as they came out or were burned withinside. It is reported that the remains of the slain were brutally mutilated, and, although some of the statements may be exaggerated, we deem them not improbable, under the circumstances of wild and passionate excitement which prevailed. Above twenty white persons were killed, and as many more wounded in this desperate affray. There was one murder perpetrated after this, and many plantation houses were plundered. But the Governor says, black gentlemen were left unmolested, and there was no attempt on the part of the rioters to raise the flame of insurrection in other districts.

Such are the facts, so far as the proceedings of the negroes are concerned. What steps were taken by the authorities in consequence? The Governor immediately put the county of Surrey, with the exception of Kingston, under martial law. He collected whatever naval and military force was within reach, and so distributed it as to hem in the disturbed district. He invited and obtained the assistance of the Maroons, an isolated tribe located in the Blue Mountains, whom he armed and employed in capturing the negroes. Perfect obedience after the affair at Morant Bay. Not a soldier was hurt. Military parties traversed every part of the district—shot down many negroes, hung more after a summary trial at the drumhead, and, within a day or two, effectually avenged the outrages at Morant Courthouse. The Governor did not, however, limit the exercise of his power to the poorer negroes. He daringly struck at a higher quarry. Mr. Gordon, a member of the Jamaica House of Assembly, and when he heard that a warrant was out against him on the ground of suspected complicity in the plot, surrendered himself at Kingston, was immediately taken to Morant Bay that he might be tried by court-martial, and was then convicted, and hanged. Some two hundred negroes, it is averred, have expiated by their death the crimes of the Morant Bay rioters, others remain to be tried, and so the carnival of blood goes on.

Her Majesty, we imagine, will appoint a Commission of Inquiry with a view to obtain an accurate view of the whole case, pending which result no trustworthy judgment of it can be formed. We remain silent until fuller information shall authorise us to speak.

The Swiss Federal Council has fixed the 14th of January next as the day for the popular vote upon the revised Federal Constitution.

Natal is in a state of excitement respecting a proclamation issued by the Governor, Sir R. P. Woodhouse, forbidding the colonists to take part in assisting Mr. Baker (aborigines). A strong petition to the Queen has been adopted, and the Governor was burnt in effigy at Durban. On Wednesday, the 13th of September, a piece of territory called the Umtamfuna was, "for all purposes whatever, annexed to and became a part of Natal." Another large tract is thus taken off the quickly diminishing proportions of Kaffraria.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, Nov. 23, 1865.

If the public writers of Europe had only waited another eight-and-forty hours before they welcomed, in glowing language, the intelligence conveyed to the world through the columns of the Moniteur respecting the constitutional reduction of the French army, they might have spared themselves the display of a good deal of misplaced enthusiasm. French official facts are usually difficult to understand with French official finance. Nearly every journal of Europe was in raptures with the programme of the Minister of War; it was the first step towards that millenium the advent of which philanthropists have been anxiously waiting for some years past. All the papers over here which take a special interest in military matters, and are accustomed to study the official returns relative to the army, set to work to ascertain the actual extent of the proposed reduction. Some immediately declared that it would amount to 40,000 men; others fixed the number as high as 42,000, or more than an eighth of the entire army on active service. The public was willing to allow all the latitude, and that the diminution which has been determined on amounts to precisely 10,800 men—a mere bagatelle out of an effective force of upwards of 420,000.

At Compiègne, on Thursday last, the guests were entertained with one of the most splendid balls in the annals of Imperial fêtes, at which both the Emperor and Empress were present; and in the evening there was, as a matter of course, the everlasting cercle at which the Lord Chief Court of Honour of the palace. The day following, M. Victorien Sardou's new comedy, entitled "Les Pattes de Mouche," which has been suggested by the late M. Dupin's speech in the Senate, on "Luxury in dress," and has met with such great success at the Vaudeville, was performed in the theatre of the château before the entire circle of Imperial guests. The audience, we are told, included the Queen of Naples and the sentimental scenes of this capital play immensely. In one of the latter, M. Sardou makes a lady of "La Famille Benoiton" thus descant on the character of white muslin:—

Ah! simple attire of my early youth, what is now become of you? You were so modest, so chaste, and yet so alluring! You were the dress of fifteen years of age, a brilliant complexion, and the delight of a fresh skin! You were the dress of a young girl who is in love, who is loved, who is afraid of a dress so simple and so gay as you are! You were the dress of a young girl who is in love, who is loved, who is afraid to pay for their husbands now deep you can hide behind your flounces, or deceive with your bows of ribbon!

The lady who pronounces this impassioned eulogy was attired, we are told, in a robe which cost her 7000f. or £280 sterling!

The Empress has established a Society of Ladies for the childrestress of the piece—the little Camille, whose performance of her part is reported by the journals to have been quite a Rachel in miniature, and rewarded her with kisses, compliments, and sweetmeats. The actors generally received valuable presents, and Sardou, on the fall of the author, being a member of the Legion of Honour, was eligible to sit at the Imperial table. Gardens, and was accordingly invited to sit on the day's dinner party.

Next day a shooting party assembled in the preserves known as the "Faisanderie," and other of the guests paid a visit to the well-known château of Pierrefonds, which is still undergoing partial restoration under the direction of the Emperor's friend, M. Viollet-le-Duc, the distinguished savant, treated the company to a familiar discourse on what, past, it had been rather a difficult task to find the guests assembled to listen to him—namely, the science of astronomy. Count Mocquard, one of the Emperor's Imperial aides-de-camp, proposed to take their departure. The Imperial family received their adieus in the splendid Salle des Gardes. Each guest was presented personally with a series of bas-reliefs representing the Triumphs of Alexander. In the afternoon the Emperor and Empress visited the excavations which are in progress under the direction of M. Viollet Leduc, at Mont St. Pierre, where innumerable archeological treasures are supposed to lie hidden.

The King and Queen of Portugal are expected at Compiègne in about a fortnight's time, but I hear nothing of any other distinguished visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales. I presume, therefore, that the rumour is premature.

The papers mention that the Princess Baciocchi's estate of Kvaer-Mount, in Denmark, is for sale, which, it would appear, is a proof that a visit about a fortnight since, is to become the property of the Prince Imperial on his coming of age.

Marshal Mahon, Duke of Magenta, is going to Vienna—some say on an indirect special mission to the Emperor of Austria—but others to Rome, and I believe the latter is the more probable.

We are to have M. Guizot amongst us in the course of a few days. He is expected to arrive in Paris on Sunday, and the Duchess always to be delivered by his son William, who has succeeded M. de Lomenie in the chair of history at the Collège de France. These lectures will be delivered in Montaigne—the ancient of essayists and the pride of every educated Frenchman.

One or two celebrities in their way have died during the past week in Paris. First, there is Madame Ida Saint Elme, whose real name is Next, Mme. Morin, formerly Louise Lebrun, who enjoyed thirty years of success in Paris as a singer at the Grand Opéra, the Opéra Comique, and the Théâtre Lyrique. She was the daughter of a celebrated tenor who was quite the rage in Paris at the commencement of the present century. Finally, the celebrated Dr. Ricord, whose name will be published and two published volumes of "Reminiscences" referring to the days of the war and of the Tuileries Empire, which will give some admirable pictures of the period. Captain Goosow was one of the last of the old school of Republicans, and died in his modest but dwelling patois of his day. In his first volume of "Reminiscences" he gives an account of the two of Louis Napoleon, and, however, giving his reader the slightest hint that the writer was the principal actor in these affairs. The Exhibition of 1867 will, several days, be an industrial exhibition recently at Vienne, in the south of France, at which a goodly number of the local lions were exhibited. The jurymen have drawn up a report upon the comparative merits of these ingenious pieces of mechanism, being all two-legged men, were as to how to proceed, when it was suggested that all the military veterans of the place who were minus either one or two legs should be selected together as the best judges. The idea was at once hailed as a regularly equipped, a race was decided upon, and the prize adjudged to the inventor of the leg which carried the man in front.

"Jennie D'Arc" has been withdrawn from the Grand Théâtre des Variétés, and Offenbach's new piece, entitled "Le Pont des Soupirs," the composer of the unlucky opera, to pay him a certain sum every evening it was performed; M. Dupuis refusing, the opera no longer figures in the nightly bills of the theatre.

BELGIUM.

In Tuesday's sitting of the Chamber of Deputies the Minister of the Interior laid on the table a report on the contagious disease prevailing among horned cattle.

The discussion of the Budget of the Ministry of Justice was adjourned. A meeting of the members of the Right has been held, at which it was decided not to raise any political discussion during the present session on the Budget of Justice; but not to oppose such a discussion if brought about by the Ministry.

HOLLAND.

M. Betz, Minister of Finance, tendered his resignation, in consequence, it is supposed, of an allusion made in the Chamber of Deputies by M. Van Bosse, Minister of the Interior, to a private letter, of a compiling character, written by the former.

DENMARK.

In last Saturday's sitting of the Rigsdag, the President of the Council, Count Frys Frysenborg, presented the draught of the bill for the revision of the Constitution as agreed to by the Rigsraad. The Minister stated that the Government expected the Rigsdag to adopt or reject the bill in its integrity without modification.

AUSTRIA.

Letters from Pesth contain numerous de tails of the preparations being made in that city for the reception of the Emperor Francis-Joseph. A guard of honour of one hundred citizens is being organised. The students will line the way where the Sovereign passes. The opening of the Diet is to be celebrated by a procession by torchlight.

A preliminary conference of the Saxon and Rumanian members of the Transylvanian Diet at Klausenburg was held on Sunday, at which it was resolved that the protocol of the sittings of the Diet should be drawn up in the three languages of the different nationalities of Transylvania. A solemn religious service was celebrated, at which the majority of the members of the Diet were present. The first session was opened, on Monday, by the Government Commissioner, who read an Imperial rescript calling upon the Assembly to maturely consider the best means to be adopted for the final settlement of the political situation of Transylvania. In their deliberations to this effect the Diet is exhorted to keep in view the union of Transylvania and Hungary as properly understood by the intimate connection of the former with the Hungarian crown. The bills subject for discussion which has been laid before the Diet is the revision of article I of the law passed by the Transylvanian Diet of 1848 relative to the union of Hungary and Transylvania.

The National Croatian party have resolved to propose the union of Croatia, Hungary, and Transylvania, and to recognise the validity of a common legislation. They further recommend that negotiations for the settlement of the question be entered into with a deputation from the Hungarian Diet.

A proclamation has been published announcing that the Emperor had ordered the release of all political prisoners arrested by the Catholic authorities from the year 1862 to the present time. All pending trials have been stopped.

GREECE.

The King having refused the despatches made by M. Bulgaris to prorogue or dissolve the Chamber, the Ministry resigned; and M. Commoundouros has resumed the portfolios of the Council, also discharging the functions of the Ministers of Foreign Affairs and the Interior. He has presented the following list of the remaining members of his Cabinet to the King:—M. Sotiropoulos, Minister of Finance; M. Lascaris, War and Marine; M. Londinchi, Public Instruction; M. Petraki, Justice.

UNITED STATES.

Captain Henry Wise has been hanged, in accordance with the sentence of the military commission, approved by the President. He met his fate with forfitude, and expressed no contrition for crimes to the last. It is said that his wife, during an interview with him in gaol, attempted to save him from the gallows by smuggling poison by passing into his mouth from her own while kissing him a bolus of morphine, but General Hancock, coming upon him at that moment, prevented the pill from his mouth.

A deputation of Baltimore ladies have had an interview with the President, and have received the clemency for Mr. Davis. The President replied that he regretted the national character of the question restricted him in the exercise of any might have existed in him, and he stated that arrangements were concluded for the early trial of Mr. Davis.

The President has announced that the passage of the constitutional amendment is necessary to the full restoration of all the States to the Union.

The recent elections have resulted in a decided Republican victory.

It is semi-officially stated that the United States army now numbers 180,000 men of all arms.

The Fenian Senate in New York have adjourned, after a session of two months.

INDIA.

The Viceroy has laid down stringent rules for securing the safety of the mails in disturbed districts.

Sir Bartle Frere will proceed immediately on a tour in the south Mahratta country.

Cholera is spreading along the Ganges, and many fatal cases have occurred.

The fanatic who killed Lieutenant A. Ommaney of the Guide Corps in Lahore, on the 6th inst., was hanged the next day.

An English girl has been the first female to the Chief of Chiana for 3000 rupees (£300). The affair has caused much excitement.

The superior council of the University of Zurich has decided that any student fighting a duel shall be immediately expelled.

The Emperor of Brazil and the Empress Dowager has granted a bill to introduce gradually a uniform rate of postage of one penny for the whole Empire. The bill will be presented to the Chamber the next year.

The Queen of Spain has commissioned her Ambassador at the Court of St. James's to present to Queen Victoria some handsome volume as a complimentary representation of the monuments of Spain.

A Moscow letter states that an artistic club has been founded in that city, to encourage dramatic talent. Concerts and amateur performances will be given during the winter, and the club will aid distressed artists.

The Pope has just sent a souvenir to the widow of the late General Lamoricière, in the shape of a medal, which has been the body of a lady martyr from the catacombs as a consolatory present to the bereaved widow. The remains are those of an unknown martyr, and the Pope gives him the name of Christopher, which was that of M. de Lamoricière.

The French corvette Isère has arrived with Rio de Janeiro advices to Oct. 24. There is little war news to report by this mail. The Paraguayans appear to be concentrating their main resources, and time must elapse before they meet. The allies are on the march. Flores, with the vanguard, is marching on the Missiones, and the general in command, Mitre, is marching on Corrientes and Gully march in the same direction, but passing by Uruguayana. Osorio is at the head of the Oriental Colonial Corps, advancing to Tranqueras de Loreto, on the Parana. The Paraguayans have been driven out of S. Carlos and other places on their south side, and Osorio is now with his contingent, is on the march, and will be in operation with the army, which is under the command of Mitre. The allies are said to be at Itapua, on the way to Asuncion (Paraguay); but they will probably not meet the main forces of Robles very little is known. The water is rising considerably in the Paraguay and Parana, and the steamers, especially the armed Brazil, will soon commence active operations.

The Government emigrant ship, the Cornwallis, 648 tons, lishing-to Mr. Hamilton, the commissioner of mines for Nova Scotia, to open an account in the registers of that colony for the gold fields. He says:—"What is geologically known as the lower silurian formation, in which are found most of the gold deposits in various countries, and which also comprises a great part of the gold deposits in Nova Scotia, extending about the whole length of from ten to forty miles in this province, a distance of 300 miles in length. Throughout this belt of country there are farmsteads placed here and there, with the exception of certain isolated spots where granitic rocks prevail, gold is found. The proportion of gold to the quartz rock in this belt varies from a mere trace to the rocks which induce them is something enormous. Wherever these rocks have been worked to any extent they have been found to be auriferous although varying much in rich ness. If, as I firmly believe, all of these deposits depend upon one great geological law, the auriferous character of quartz deposits will be found to be much more than a local one. In many of the more recent geological formations there are rocks of a more recent geological formation, and these rocks, under the immediate direction of the Queensland Government. She contains 479 souls, divided into paying assisted, and free passengers.

OPENING OF THE ITALIAN PARLIAMENT.

THE first session of the second Parliament of the kingdom of Italy was opened, last Saturday, by King Victor Emmanuel, in the old "Hall of the Five Hundred" of the Palazzo Vecchio at Florence, which is to be used for the Chamber of Deputies until the Basilica di San Pierone, formerly a convent, situated at no great distance behind the Palazzo Vecchio, has been altered and fitted for the permanent House of Parliament.

The Hall of Five Hundred, on the first floor of the ancient Palazzo, which was built as the original building, towards the end of the fifteenth century, by the counsel of that great political and religious reformer the monk Savonarola, in order to provide accommodation for the popular legislative assembly, comprising all citizens who paid their taxes, invested with supreme power after the temporary overthrow of the Medicean tyranny. This vast hall, which is 175 ft. in length by 75 ft. in breadth, with a very lofty roof, is decorated with six monumental frescos on the walls, by Vasari, representing the old wars between Florence and Pisa and Siena; while the ceiling is also painted, in thirty-nine compartments, with scenes illustrating the history of Florence and of other Tuscan cities. Of the statues, chiefly by Baccio Bandinelli, which were ranged along its sides, all those representing the princes of the Medici family and the Popes Leo X. and Clement VII., have now been removed to the vestibule, leaving the unfinished group, by Michael Angelo, of "Victory and the Captive Foe," as well as the "Virtue and Vice," by Giovanni da Bologna, placed on each side of the King's throne. The engineer and architect Mazzoni has been employed to fit up the hall as the new Chamber of Deputies; and he has done so by erecting a lofty wooden screen across it, so as to leave a long, shallow space for the Chamber, the other portion being made into a vestibule. The seats or benches of the deputies, with desks in front of the seats, are covered with dark blue velvet, and ranged in two or three concentric rows, in a horse-shoe form; the president's chair (which on this occasion was represented by the throne) and the raised desks for the secretaries and ceustores being on a platform facing the benches. The arrangements around the throne, as well as the decorations, being, like the seats, of dark blue velvet, the whole looked rather dark on Saturday, which was a gloomy, wet day. The Italian Government statists, the ladies, the newspaper reporters, and the general public have their several galleries on three sides of the hall. The Senate will erect in another apartment of the same building.

Between eleven and twelve o'clock on Saturday the floor was occupied by the members of both Houses of Parliament, who musteread about four hundred, while the galleries were crowded with an equal audience, amongst whom the American ambassador, was Mr. Layard, the English Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs, in company with the Hon. Mr. Bingham, the British minister at Florence, at the Italian Court, and Sir James Hudson, who preceded Mr. Elliot at that post, and who is also the present British minister to Turin. At the right of the throne, Ministers and other officials appeared in uniform. Precisely at twelve the royal staff, headed by the King, came in with his customary punctuality, accompanied by Princes Humbert and Amadeus, and followed by his Majesty's wife Queen Maria Mamora and Petitti, Mr. Sella, and the other Ministers. His Majesty was exceedingly well received. Everybody, even, there was loud clapping of hands, and a general shout of "Viva il Re!" repeated heartily again and again, the King bowing, and, although wearing his usual buff look, seeming to be in good health. However, he could hardly be otherwise, for people generally are very well affected towards him, and have believed in the sincerity of his word in showing it; while he, on his part, has taken manifest pains to prove himself worthy of the good-will of his subjects. The Princes and the Queen and the King sat down, his two sons remaining standing on each side and a little in rear of the latter. The Queen's throne was signified to the Assembly his Majesty's commands that it should be seated. A form of words was then read by the secretary of the senate created since the last Parliament separated were called over, those who were present answering "Giuro"—"I swear." The same formality was then gone through with the deputies; and this done, and when the King, sitting, read his speech in a loud, clear, sonorous voice. His words were generally audible in every part of the hall. The speech was as follows:—

When I had to open the Parliament in the city which was the first guardian of the destinies of Italy, I always uttered expressions of encouragement and hope, and foretold a year always happier than the last.

It is with the same confidence that I speak to you in this capital, where we shall labour together how to overcome certain crises in the economical conditions of our self-government. My Government, from its deference for the Papacy, and in keeping the religious sentiments of the majority of the populations, accepted proposals for some negotiations, which it interrupted the moment the intention of the Pontiff were calculated to impede the work of the Council, and of the nation.

The present crisis of events will solve the questions of difference which exist between the Holy See and the Papal See. The Council, which is the Ecumenical Synod of Bishops, which France will execute completely within the delay fixed, so far as we are concerned, will be the end of the crisis whatever our situation has greatly improved.

The sympathies of civilised nations will aid us in our work. A community of interests and the bonds of gratitude maintain us in close friendship with France. We are in good relations with the rest of Europe, particularly now with the Governments of both Americas.

A vast field has been opened to trade by advantageous treaties with England, Russia, Holland, Denmark, Switzerland, as before with France, Sweden, Belgium, Portugal, and Spain.

Spain, a short time ago, recognised the new Italian flag, and has entered into relations with us on the same intention, which Prussia, Baden, and the Hanseatic towns have already completed.

That the bonds between the nations of the Latin race are strengthened, and with the noble Germanic nations the friendship of the Courts, and the most commercial relations, such as will lead to extinguish old prejudices and rancour, Italy will, therefore, take her place amongst the great European powers, by co-operating in the triumph of justice and of liberty. Liberty has already produced the happiest effects in the internal condition of the country. Public administrative departments, the public works, the codes, and the army, have been ordered with a precision which, in certain cases, is admirable, in spite of several generations. What better augury can there be for the future?

The finances, which are the most important question, require our attention, and also the interdiction of the unproductive expenditure, the public credit, and works of public utility. The great difficulty before us is to arrive at a regular equilibrium of the finances without the increase of taxation of the land and sea forces. I regret much that fresh sacrifices are to be demanded from my people, but I have not the slightest hesitation in doing the wounting. The members of the two Chambers will divide the charges as equitably as possible, reducing as far as possible the expenses which are whatever occurs, Italy must free herself from the oppressive remnants of the past.

You will, therefore, have also to discuss the separation of Church and State in accordance with the principles proclaimed.

Possessing a free minister, neither the religion of the nations or its ruler will succeed in destroying our work. A realised and inevitable change is taking place among European nations. The Italian race, by the force of its life, in the accomplishment of the destinies of Italy, new dangers were to arise, I am sure for the future we would once more be ready. But if the new order of civilisation should prevail, then the mature wisdom of the nation will be brought into action.

Senators and Deputies,—In order that the rights and the honour of Italy may always remain inviolable, we need enhance liberty by the union of national policy.

Certain of your support, confiding in the affection of the people and in the valour of the army, I shall not abandon the noble work which we are to hand down complete to future generations.

Several passages of this speech, as when the King spoke of "the triumph of justice and liberty" and again when he spoke of "Italy must free herself from the oppressive remnants of the past," were greeted with a burst of applause. The following passage was received by the most cordial and unanimous cheering. The Minister of the Interior declared that the Session opened by the King was open to the Assembly, and left the hall with his sons, the eldest of whom, Prince Humbert, then took the seats as a senator. The streets of Florence were brightly illuminated on Saturday night.

The recognition of Italy by Bavaria has been officially notified, and the ex-King of Naples, Francis, has been invited to withdraw his Ambassador from Munich.

The Central Committee of the Schleswig-Holstein political associations has been dissolved by order of the Government, and all future meetings are prohibited under penalty of a fine.

An Imperial ukase has been sent to the Governor of Warsaw for the organisation, by which the term of military service in Russia is reduced to ten years, six of which are to be served in the line and four in the reserve.

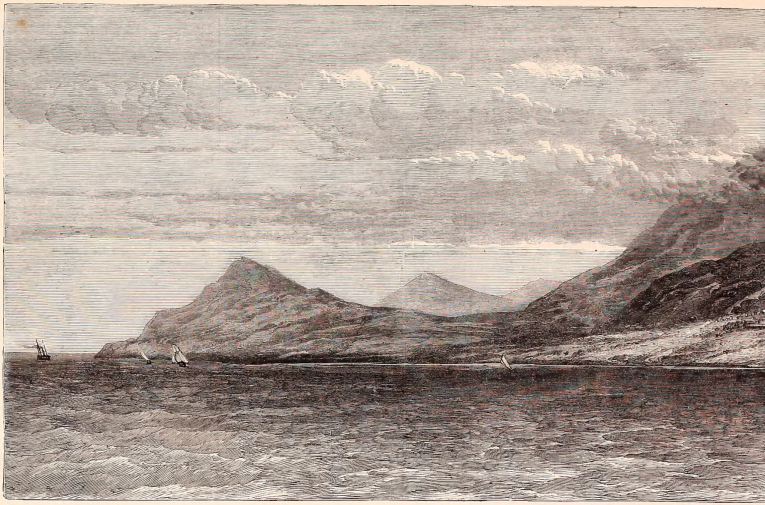
with kingdoms as an Etrurian potter dealt with clay. Later again, Tuscany was made part of France, and given to Elisa, Napoleon's sister; but with the fall of the great despot fell his edifices, and Ferdinand III. was restored. He was succeeded, in 1824, by Leopold II., who, in 1848, granted a constitution. The taste of freedom revived the old fire of the Florentines, and they rose and proclaimed a Republic; but the sword of Austria was too heavy for them, and, in 1850, the Duke was replaced on his throne. But the people have been fairly roused once more, and a second time Duke Leopold had to leave his capital, in which the King of Sardinia was proclaimed; the Duke endeavoured, by abdication in favour of his son Ferdinand, to preserve the dynasty; but a Parliament was called, and it did unto the house of Lorraine that which our Parliament did unto the house of Stuart—that is, repudiated it. Tuscany demanded annexation to Sardinia. The vote has been recorded, and the liberation of great part of Italy having been worked out and an Italian kingdom instituted, Florence finds itself the capital of Italy. The most heartfelt wishes for the prosperity of the kingdom and of its new metropolis are uttered wherever men love freedom; but from no place in the world comes so cordial a greeting to Florence and to Italy, on this crowning event in the history of both, as from England, who rejoices to see the new kingdom based on institutions kindred to her own.

THE COURT.

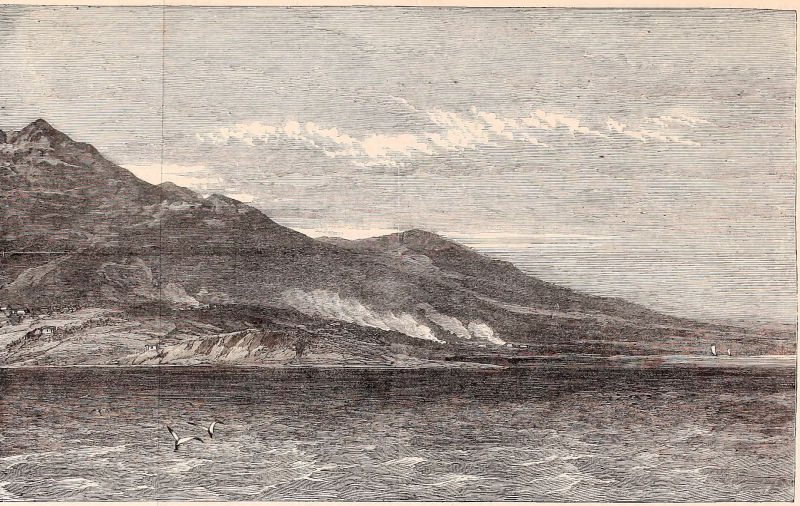


THE Queen, with the Crown Prince and Crown Princess of Prussia and the junior members of the Royal family, continues at Windsor Castle, in the enjoyment of good health.

On Thursday week her Majesty accompanied by the Crown Prince and Crown Princess of Prussia and Princess Helena, and attended by Lady Wenlock and Lord Charles Fitzroy, left Windsor. Her Majesty went to London. The Queen left Windsor at ten minutes to eleven by a special train for the Great Western Railway Station. Upon arriving in London her Majesty drove to Mr. Armstead's and Mr. Calder Marshall's studios and inspected the sculptures for the Albert Memorial Chapel, Queen's memorial in Hyde Park. The Queen afterwards drove to Buckingham Palace, and received the Duke of Cambridge, a quarter past two o'clock. Later in the day her Majesty, accompanied by Princess Helena and Princess Louisa, walked in the castle grounds. The Crown Prince and Crown Princess of Prussia returned to the castle in the evening.

Yesterday week the Queen, accompanied by the Crown Princess of Prussia and Princess Helena, drove in the afternoon in the royal demesne. The Duke of Cambridge arrived at the castle on a visit to her Majesty.

On Saturday last the Queen, accompanied by Princess Louisa and attended by the Hon. Harriet Phipps, Colonel Ponsonby, the Crown Princess of Prussia and Princess Helena took a drive. The Crown Prince of Prussia and the Duke of Cambridge rode on horseback. The Prince and Princess Louis of Hesse, attended by Baroness von Scheerk and Baron de Reizenstein, arrived from Darmstadt. Viscount Torrington and Major-General Seymour, C.B., were the Lord and Groom in Waiting to the Duke of Cambridge. It was further progressed from Thursday, Nov. 19, to Thursday, Dec. 28. The meeting of the Houses of Convocation of the province of Canterbury and York was at the same time prorogued to Friday, Dec. 29. Later in the day the Queen, accompanied by Princess Louisa, Prince Arthur, Princess Louis and attended by Lord Charles Fitzroy, drove out. The Crown Princess of Prussia and Princess Beatrice drove out. The drove in the grounds of the castle. Prince Louis of Hesse and the Crown Prince of Prussia and Prince Louis of Hesse went shooting. Prince Arthur, attended by Major Elphinstone, left the castle and the Count and Countess Gleichen also arrived, and had the honour of dining with her Majesty.



On Tuesday the Queen, accompanied by the Crown Prince and Crown Princess of Prussia, drove in the afternoon. Princess Helena and Princess Beatrice took a drive. This was the twenty-fifth anniversary of the birthday of Prince Arthur, which was also celebrating views at the castle. The Crown Princess of Prussia and Prince and Princess Louis of Hesse, with Princess Helena, Princess Louisa, Prince Arthur, Prince Leopold, and Princess Beatrice, and a juvenile party were honoured with Royal invitations. The Queen, accompanied by the Queen's command and by the Crown Princess's special evening, by the Queen's command and by the Crown Princess's special evening, by the Queen's command and by the Crown Princess's special evening,

THE PALACE AND PARK FOR THE PARIS UNIVERSAL EXHIBITION OF 1867.

(From our Paris Correspondent.)

THE works in the Champ de Mars for the Palace and Park of the Paris Universal Exhibition of 1867 are making considerable progress. Hundreds of labourers are now employed in laying out the immense space. Steam-engines, too, are incessantly at work, and strings of carts are constantly arriving on the ground to deposit loads upon loads of earth, many thousand cubic feet of which will be required to raise that portion of the site occupied by the building and its approaches to the requisite level. Everything shows that M. Le Play, the commissioner for the exhibition, is in earnest, and means forward with the utmost rapidity. The form of the colossal ellipse is also traced out; the foundations of the Palace are being laid; and the masonry, I hear, is to be completed early in the ensuing spring.

It will be in the recollection of your readers that, in the brief description which accompanied the Plan of the Palace and Park of the Paris Universal Exhibition of 1867 published in the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS of Oct. 14, I mentioned that a competition had been set on foot by Mr. Mare, architect, of Brondey, to be considered the initiator both of the particular form of building and of the system of double classification which the Imperial Commissioners had decided upon adopting, as I showed by quotting from an official document made public at the time, on the very 1867. Since then Mr. Mare has put in circulation another letter, addressed by him to the members of the Imperial Commission, wherein he requires to be informed of the manner in which the above design has been selected, intimating, as it seems, that if this be withheld he can only, at the Exhibition-opening, date his claim. Mr. Mare's design which the Imperial Commissioners have decided to make use of. For the information of your readers I subjoin a brief sketch of it, to put on record the exact particulars of this matter, and how it came to pass that the precise design which the Commissioners have determined to adopt came into existence. No one will, of course, venture to deny that it was Prince Napoleon who first broached the idea of the system of double classification—to which I have already alluded—so far back as 1855. Impressed with this idea, and bent on its realization, when the time arrived for taking active measures for the formation of the Exhibition of 1867, the Prince gathered together, under his own eye, at the Palais Royal, a body of men, chiefly of "Industrie, a corps of architects and engineers, to whom he confided the task of preparing a series of plans for the adoption of the system of classification of which he had already given the ideas. These gentlemen were placed by Prince Napoleon under the orders of M. Le Play, who had been Commissaire-General of the Paris Exhibition of 1855 and was appointed Commissioner-General of the forthcoming Exhibition of 1867; and in due course M. Le Play, with the sanction of Prince Napoleon, submitted the plans thus produced to the decision of the Imperial Commission.

The rectangular form of building, with semicircular ends, came to be elected chiefly because it was the form best adapted to the Champ de Mars; and, indeed, the site hardly admitted of any other. This plan has since had various modifications made in it, but not those of the immediate direction of the Imperial Commission itself, which is the real reason why no name of the architect, Mr. Mare or any other, although Prince Napoleon and M. Le Play have had the largest share in the origination of the adopted plan, is to be met with. It now stands is really the collective work of the Imperial Commission.

The foregoing statement is made, of course upon reliable information, by our Paris correspondent. It was communicated, when published on the 14th ult. Mr. Mare's claim was noticed but incidentally. It was shown, from Prince Napoleon's Report on the Exhibition of 1855, that the Prince, while he had originated the idea of double or oval building, had distinctly set forth "the double system of classification, both geographical and by groups, as the distinctive character of the products exhibited," which is to be the distinctive feature of the Exhibition of 1867. "Is it necessary to discrupon remarked"—Without denying to Mr. Mare the merit of having suggested a circle or ellipse for the building, which he may or may not have been the first to do, nothing contained in his paper published in the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, 1855, can possibly detract from the originality of Prince Napoleon's suggestions made four years previously." Upon this, Mr. Mare sent us the following letter:—

"To the Editor of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

"SIR,—As there are one or two important omissions in your account of what has passed between the French Exhibition Commissioners and myself relative to the authorship of the plan for the elliptical exhibition building of 1867, would you allow me to state more in detail the grounds upon which the claim is based? I would first observe that the plan was designed jointly by myself and the late Henry J. Pepys, F.I.B.A., of Birmingham. I refer to the engraving, published in the Builder of Feb. 16, 1861, of which, for the purpose, the original was actually tendered, more than four years ago, through M. Mocquard, for the purpose for which it is here mentioned. As a consequence of this with the French official design, your readers may see that the elliptical form is only one out of many forms of building which cannot possibly be the result of a series of accidental coincidences or of separate and independent authorship. Not only are the two designs identical as to the elliptical form, and the peculiar system of double classification, which we were the first to propose, as applied to the elliptical garden, the number of the avenues radiating from the central garden, and the open arcade surrounding the elliptical building are common to both designs; and it would, for the same reason, be absurd to suppose that the number of open spaces or wide and narrow radial avenues in our design.

"At a first glance there appears to be a slight difference in the spirit of the exhibiting-blocks in the two designs, arising from the fact that points in which the French design deviates from ours are exactly described in the letterpress accompanying it as improvements. It may be next that, 'if it is desired to divide the whole or any part of the space into courts, as in the Exhibition of 1851, the exhibiting-blocks may be converted into inclosed spaces, without sacrificing the double system of classification.' And again, that, 'if it is desired to provide for covering might require wider exhibiting-blocks than others, there would be no objection to vary the widths of the concentric rings to suit necessity.' Both these suggestions are carried out in our design.

"With regard to Prince Napoleon's proposal for an arrangement based upon a rectangular instead of an elliptical form of double classification, this plan was proposed, so long ago as 1850, by Mr Pottenden, and was freely discussed in the Builder of that year. It was given up as impracticable on account of not providing the necessary variety in the areas of adjacent specific and geographical divisions. The plan was not attempted for the French Exhibition of 1855; and it was not till 1861 that the difficulty of the rectangular form of double division was solved by the plan submitted to M. Mocquard for the intended French Exhibition.—Yr., &c. of the honouring radial and concentric avenues based on an ellipse, which, by providing any relative proportions of adjacent geographical and specific areas, made it applicable to the exigencies of the productions of any district.

"I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

"JOHN MARE.

Denthall, Brockley, Oct. 16.

In a later communication from Mr. Mare, dated the 14th inst., we learn that M. Hardy, who was merely named as "the architect of the palace," discloses any participation in the authorship of the design. Mr. Mare further says, "It is clear to me that I have made any claim against the commissioners for pecuniary compensation."].

In our description last week of the Crystal Palace at Oporto, now occupied by the European International Exhibition, it should have been stated that the contractors, Messrs. Edmeston, Birmingham, performed the whole work of fitting up the gaslighting apparatus throughout the building; and this was done on very short notice, the contract being made late in July and the work completed most satisfactorily in less than one month from that date.

The Queen has approved of M. Gustav Schlinoff as Consul at Cuxhaven, and of Mr. E. S. Hutchinson as Consul at Miramichi, for the King of Prussia; of Mr. F. H. Fust Assistitting as Consul at Alvaro, for the King of the Belgians; and of Mr. James Whittall as Consul-General at Hong-Kong, for the King of the Hawaiian Islands.

MUSIC.

The production of Mr. Leslie's new opera, "Ida; or, the Guardian Storks," at the Royal English Opera, Covent-garden, on Wednesday week, was attended with the outward signs and tokens of success. But such signs go for little on a first night; and in the present instance we think they will not turn out to have been more significant than usual. Notwithstanding the applause, the encores, and the calls for the principal performers and the composer before the curtain at the end of every act, the general impression seems to be that the piece will not long maintain its place on the stage. The work, indeed, is not made of durable materials. The libretto, though from the practised pen of Mr. Palgrave Simpson, is by no means happy. The plot is so intricate and confused that nobody has pretended even to understand it, and there is therefore does not excite a spark of interest—a fatal fault in a dramatic piece, whether opera or not. Moreover, the story of the opera has probably suffered from the nature of his subject; for, though the music is very good of its kind, it is essentially light and airy, yet it is laboured and heavy, smelling of the lamp rather than sparkling with the brilliancy of a creation of genius. Mr. Leslie has, unfortunately, into critical details which would be useless, we shall content ourselves with saying that the musical numbers are distributed by Miss Julia Gillies, Miss Emma Heywood, Mr. W. Cummings, Mr. H. Corri, Mr. Lyall, Mr. Downe, and Mr. Aynsley Cook; that the scoring and staging were as good as circumstances would permit; and that the piece, in its ensemble, was carefully placed upon the stage.

The first performance for the season of the Sacred Harmonic Choral Society took place at Exeter Hall, on Thursday week, under the direction of Sir G. A. Macfarren, who has been appointed conductor of the society. The oratorio selected for this occasion was Mendelssohn's "Elijah," which was performed with the principal characters filled by Mdme. Marin and his tuneful host. His chorus is equal in numerical strength to that of the Sacred Harmonic Society, and, if it has not yet attained to the same degree of excellence, it is under a capable management, of the great body which has been trained for so many years by Mr. Costa, yet it possesses the elements of good singing, and will evidently in a state of constant improvement. The solo-singers were Mdme. Rudersdorff, Mdme. Patey, Mr. Barton, Mr. Lewis, Mr. Wilbye, and Mr. Distin. Mr. Santley was to have sung the part of the Prophet, but was prevented from appearing by a heavy domestic affliction (the death of one of his children), and his place was creditably supplied by Mr. Renwick. Mdme. Rudersdorff, who was in good voice, and whose singer possessed of a fine tenor voice, and gives great promise of future eminence. The next performance of the society will be given early in this month, will be "The Creation," with Miss Louisa Pyne, Mr. Leigh Wilson, and Mr. Santley in the principal solo parts.

On the following evening (Friday week) the Sacred Harmonic Society gave their first performance of the season. It consisted of Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," Haydn's Symphony in E flat, "Requiem," two pieces which the society are in the custom of giving on the same occasion. The solo singers in the "Hymn of Praise" were by Mdme. Lemmens-Sherrington, Mrs. S. Smith, and Mr. Sims Reeves; in the "Requiem" the concerted pieces (there are no solos) were sung by Mdme. Sherrington, Mdme. Sainton-Dolby, Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. Wilbye Cooper, and Mr. Weiss. The whole performances were in good style, and well received.

Signor Arditi began his series of grand vocal and instrumental concerts at Her Majesty's Theatre on Saturday week. Of the general plan and arrangements of these concerts we have already spoken. Not only does the present programme resemble similar to those of the late M. Jullien and Mr. Alfred Mellon, but are intended to be of a still more recherché and classical character. In this intention was fully carried out in the first concert, the music which was a musical treat of the highest order. To show that this is the case it is only necessary to say that the programme included Mozart's symphony in G minor, given entire; Lindpainter's overture to "Faust," Beethoven's concerto in G, for pianoforte; Weber's Adagio and Rondo for violoncello; and several other selected pieces of the highest order, well known to the amateurs of the present day. Great interest was excited by the debut in this country of Signor Alfredo Piatti, a young Italian performer on the violoncello, who has gained a great reputation in Italy, and who now stepped forth boldly but with the confidence of a master-musician and a gulop, by Mr. D. Godfrey, our most popular composer of music of that class. A large audience assembled on the first night, and the whole performances went off with the greatest éclat.

THE THEATRES.

The reopening of the Strand, on Saturday, was an object of considerable interest to enterprising playgoers; and accordingly the doors were besieged early, and soon as opened the theatre was filled to overflowing. The management have certainly reason to be glad that the theatre had been much enlarged and to a certain extent refitted, and we may add that the Strand possesses a much larger number of visitors and increased convenience to all. The improvement in approach to the dress-circle, however, is by no means not only contains a suite of comfortable chairs, but affords room for a lobby round the circle, which is a great boon to the audience. The task of reconstructing the theatre has been confided to Mr. Phipps, R.I.B.A., the architect of the Lyceum Theatre, the builder. Among the beneficial alterations effected we may mention that the gallery, as well as the pit, has been much improved, and that the new staircases of stone and brick have been provided. The roof has been raised 10 ft., and is 52 ft. in span. It is also illuminated by a new system, and is ventilated by a new method, which is ingeniously communicating therewith. The acting and other parts of the house are all tastefully decorated by Mr. Gordon Crosby, of Great Portland-street, with ornaments made by Mr. Parthy, of Rathbone-place, and the curtain is by Mr. Telbin, of Bayswater. The Strand, the greater capacity of the theatre will give increased importance to the performances; and add to the comfort of the audience. As might have been expected, they commenced operations with a new burlesque; and Mr. Gilbert, who has made the Strand his special, will not, we hope, let Mr. Meyerbeer's last grand lyric production, "L'Africaine;" or, The Queen of the Cannibal Islands." Mr. Meyerbeer's music is not dashing and daring of our burlesque writers, and never was more extravagant than in his present venture. Not only does the plot of the libretto of the opera we have named tend to trace the story. He has divided his subject into five scenes—all beautifully painted by Mr. C. Fenton, and three especially admirable—the first of the Port of Lisbon, the interior of a board the Don Quay, and the Upas-tree. Miss Hayuham, as Don Pedro, makes a blustering and effective Vasco de Gama, and Miss Fanny Wenker, and imparted liveliness to the action which, we are bound to say, was not always flagging, owing to their unmanageable difficulty. Miss Ada Swanborough, as Inez, was interesting, and gave value to the love scenes between her and Vasco de Gama (Mr. T. Stoyle), which otherwise would have wanted tone and colour; for the part of Vasco de Gama is not by far from easy to their accomplishment five, though generally a telling and efficient actor. Selika, the Queen of the Cannibal Islands," Mr. Burnand has made nothing and daring of our burlesque writers, and never was more extravagant than in his present venture. Turner, as Don Pedro, was extremely droll, particularly funny. It only remains to add that the music is original, and the work of Mr. Frank Musgrave, who has shown in it his usual pleasing talent.

Miss Herbert has reproduced "Lady Audley's Secret" at the St. James's, where it is again drawing great houses.

The portrait of the late Mr. Vincent Wallace in last week's ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS was engraved by Mr. Kenyil, at Regent-street.

Amongst the patents lately taken out in France are the follow ing:—A hygienic alphabet, in conjunction; a method of making bandresses, cups, and pocket-handkerchiefs in paper; a mechanical fan, opening and shutting instantaneously, as necessary for cutting slices by means of a system of prints, reproducing minutely the relief required; an apparatus for making food people bear; and tea patents for stopping railway trains.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

On Monday Lord William Lennox delivered an interesting lecture on Physical Education to the members of the Chelsea Literary Institution.

Marquis Townshend has presented £1000 to the funds of the British Home for Incurables, Clapham-rise.

The principal business before the Metropolitan Board of Works yesterday week was the consideration of a committee that Mr. Rice's scheme for the utilisation of the sewage should, with certain modifications, be carried out at Crossness and the Thames. This recommendation was adopted by a large majority of the Board.

At the evening general meeting of the Royal Geographical Society, on Monday next, the following papers will be read:—"Overland Journey from Rockhampton to Cape York, Australia," by Edward Palmer; "Notes on a Discovery of a Route between Rockingham Bay and the Valley of Lagoons," by E. G. Lamond; "Journey of Sixteen Days Around the Silica along the Coasts of Northern and Western Australia," by Mr. J. P. Shaw.

The Queen has granted, at the request of the council of the British Horological Institute, have taken measures to supply the citizens of London with correct time by means of seven large clocks, striking, and illuminated, in electric communication with the standard clock at the Royal Observatory, Greenwich; and the Lambeth Palace, Westminster Abbey, Admiralty, and somewhere near Tower-hill are the localities fixed upon for placing clocks.

The annual general meeting of the friends of the Westminster Asylum and Clerks' Schools was held, on Monday, at the Guildhall Coffee-house—Mr. Wm. Hunt in the chair. The report stated that the income from the general fund during the last twelve months amounted to £2870, and for the building fund, £1100, leaving a total of £3970. The general expenditure was £3513, and on the new building they were £3640. The general expenses were £643 to exceed the income by £643, which was owing to the increased number of children provided for and the high prices of certain articles of consumption. Last year there were eighty-eight children in the asylum.

The monument to William Makepeace Thackeray, in Kensal-green Cemetery, was unveiled on Tuesday. The memorial consists of a bust, by Baron Marochetti, upon a base of red serpentine, mounted on a bronze panel, with the following inscription:—a simple record of the name and the dates of birth and of death. The bust is slightly toned. It is erected over the grave of Thackeray's second daughter, behind the central Gallery. The daughters of the lamented author were present at this completion of the tribute to their father's memory, as well as the Dean of Westminster, the architect, and Mr. Shirley Brooks, the honorary secretary to the fund, also attended.

A few weeks ago we recorded the death of the Rev. C. P. Holden, the Curate-in-charge of Hoxton. We have now to record the death of Dr. William Helps, the late resident physician of that establishment. Dr. Helps was first appointed to the district of Hoxton as a student two years ago. He was appointed assistant medical officer, and Dr. Hood, resident physician, in 1878. Dr. Helps was the Lord Lieutenant's nominee to the rescue visitor to Chancery lunatics, and the governors of the hospital were unanimous in their desire to pay a tribute to the memory of the deceased, with whom he had been associated so many years. Dr. Helps, from the steps of his profession, and assisted by Dr. Williams, the present acting superintendent of the hospital, had the whole of the duties of the medical department imposed upon him. He was sincerely beloved by his colleagues, and by all the patients of the hospital. He was a man of the most kindly disposition, and in whose cause he may be said to have sacrificed his valuable life. He was fathom of the late Dr. Helps, of Bayswater, and nephew of Mr. Bond, treasurer of the hospital, Mr. J. E. Johnson, and the principal officers and members of the staff.

On Monday the first meeting this session of the Royal Asiatic Society was held at 20, Hanover-square—Mr. Reginald Stuart, M.P., in the chair. A paper by the Rev. Dr. Hoole was read on the late Dr. Bruce's collection of Abyssinian MSS., which is the oldest Tamil poem in existence, and none of the present native dialects have such a high antiquity as the Tamil. There are 1000 lines in the district of the south of Madras. The Kural was written in high Tamil, and was translated into the modern dialect by the late Mr. Ellis. The poem is divided into three parts, and contains 1330 couplets of seven words each, and although authorities differ somewhat as to its real date, it is supposed to be about contemporary with the Christian era. Some of the couplets seem to be of a high order of poetical merit. Two stanzas form a chapter, which is a string of aphorisms on the same subject or theme. The writer has three human aims for its object—virtue, wealth, and love—and is full of similes and comparisons. The poem is divided into 133 chapters, and the whole poem was translated by Mr. Ellis, of Madras, about forty years ago; but it was not published till 1840, when it appeared in 1000 copies, at a heavy loss to the author. The poem is full of allusions about the manners and customs of the time in which it was written, and affords evidence that the Tamil nation was civilised at the time of the Christian era.

The birth-rate of 3074 children (1052 boys and 1022 girls) were registered last week in London. In the corresponding weeks of ten years, 1872-81, the average number recorded was 2,956, and increase of 118 births. The deaths registered in London during last week were 1615. It was the fortyfirst week of the year, and the deaths were 118 below the average number for the corresponding week of the previous ten years. NATIONAL SPORTS.

THERE was a good attendance at Tattersalls' on Monday, and three of the Hon. Mr. Calthorpe's hunters made just 1000 gs. Lord Cadigan gave 380 gs. for Bovill, who looks as good as his great Westminster Hall namesake, and Lord Londesborough 65 gs. less for Sorbosan. Catch 'em Alive created some interest, as such a bottled-up Cumbershire Snikes winner was certain to do; but 50 gs. was his ultimate figure. The 150 gs. mare, Mr. Stirling's, was added Lord Wilton's three-year-old leader by Newminster from Boarding-school Miss to his Eltham store; and Colonel Maud bought Mr. Bell's, for 160 gs. the three-year-old Venus by Orlando from Volley (in foal to Citadel), which was sold at the Royal sale as a yearling for 240 gs. Mr. Bell's Lord Stamford stud fetched very poor prices. The highest-priced yearling was the Dandelio-Petrea filly for 200 gs., which made 170 gs. above what she did at Doncaster two month since, owing, no doubt, to a belief that the bad has been found wanting in a spavin. Wilke Shape (270 gs.), a 420 guinea Doncaster purchase of the year before, was the highest-priced horse in training, and Mr. Jackson's Newcastle, were bought in, and we hear that the foreigners offered 2500 gs. for the former.

It is said that Sir Frederick Johnstone, one of the finest riders at Melton, has made a bet of £5000 even (p.p.) with Mr. Jackson, the owner of Blair Athol, that he pounds him at the Tattersall's country after Christmas, each to ride horses their own property at the present time. Mr. Jackson is a determined man with Mr. Merry, and always well mounted. Still, if it ever comes off, he will have his work cut out, as he will have to give away 10 lb., to say nothing of the extra 5 lbs. Queen said which is known to fame by Sir Frederick having ridden him over a wall-dam in the Burton country, so that Mr. Jackson will have an opponent who will lead him into as many "traps" as an Ariel.

The five days "by Shrewsbury clock" are over, some of them with thirteen events, and writers, as usual, are quarrelling over the virtues and demerits of Mr. Frail. Mr. Frail, however, has not only accomplished this year, so when Rataplan, Fisherman, and Caller Ou were in their prime. The St. Leger winner has won his 20 races this year, and she will look through a bridle no more. Regalia and Sydmonton have won the same number, but the former's mare has also won for three of hers. Ackworth and Breeze have each won three, and there are fifteen single winners. Mr. Merry's success is enough of it to said to have pretty well finished both the horses engaged in it. Caller Ou carried off one of the Queen's Plates, Sydmonton the other, won three or four less than Lord Coventgham.

George Fordham, as it appears from the tables of the promptest of the turf statisticians, has ridden 414 races this season, ending with Shrewsbury, and won 142, which is a larger number than he ever achieved except in '63, when he rode 154 winners. In 1862 Fordham had 111 wins out of 344 mounts, and Carroll in third, with 73 out of 326. This season shows a great gain, and Custance is next to Fordham, with 63 out of 189, his exact number of last season, and 20 below the season before. Morris, a very steady young jockey, who has engaged to the Tuppill stable, is fifth, with 37 out of 279; and "Gladiateur" Grimshaw, with his 30 out of 151 mounts, is sixth. Wells is fifth here in quantity, Aldcroft has only been "up" seventeen times and won twice. His difference with Lord Coventry and his following 11 lb. weight over for the Derby have been against him; but if his weight is only right next season, and he "rides to orders," we may look to see some more of those "Chifney rushes" in which not a jockey of the day can rival him. That rare jockey Challoner has been up 174 times; but the patience jockey has had to exercise in waiting for a mount is tited with 27 wins. John Osborne and Wells have had but a poor time of it. Norman has only won one race, but the number engaged to was the Oaks; and Carter's only coup is that beautifully-ridden Cambridgeshire on Gardener. Of the Liverpool Autumn Cup winners of 29 out of 117; and William Boyce, whom we trust to see "up" on to Lord Falmouth charges, has had a mount in 29 out of the number, and all of them Queen's plates.

The crowded Hurst Herring gallery was sold last week by auction. It includes four racing scenes, six stud scenes, The Start for the Derby in Cricketer's Year, a Dutchman, "Full Cry," and other pictures and interiors. It was put up and bought in by Mr. Foore last year for about £1700, and sold to Mr. Bristow at an advance. The death of the late proprietor naturally excited much interest in the sale which was bid for Mr. Richard Sutton, the owner of Lord Lyon, the first favourite for the Derby, was outbidden by Mr. Merry. Mr. Merry, for Mr. Marsden, who was bidding on commission. Mr. Herring has left, exclusive of single horses, about seventy unfinished pictures of hunting country fairs and two rabbit subjects, behind him: at least fiveand-twenty unfinished canvases, and a great many sketches in oil and pencil sketches. This very interesting sale will take place at Messrs. Christie's between the meeting of Parliament and the beginning of the racing season.

The clearance in three leading Scottish kennels rather thinned out the Altcar Club ranks, but still forty-two out of eighty-seven came before Mr. Westropp for the Kirton Handicap. Mr. Spilsbi's three Sea Foams were put out in their first course, and Mr. Jackson's Bess Burly, by Picton from old Belle, took the stake over the Border. Thirty-six out of eighty-five were left to compete for the Cup, and Mr. Spinks was more lucky, and won with his Sea Fly after two undecided courses with Black Tyrop (dog). Coursing has been over more than the Altcar Club cup, which she has so often won; but Goodwood decided her in her first course, though not without a trial. Goodwood Gunbeat went down, as usual, in his third course; and old Glendower, who knows every inch of the ground, was not to be denied the last posts on the Newmarket flat, took the cup back to Malton.

The ruling of the ex-Mayor of Worcester that a dog to pad-groom is "a gentleman rider" has led to a sifting of the subject. By the new rules, members of twenty-seven clubs, including the jockey clubs of Lewes, Berlin, and Worcester, are entitled to ride, as well as naval and military officers on full pay, gentlemen holding commissions under the Crown, and their sons and brothers. These rule so qualified can be balloted for by a committee of thirteen, as at present constituted, and, if elected, must pay a subscription to the Jockey Club Fund. Mr. William Craven is, as usual, the prime mover in this very desirable amendment of a very pernicious system. As to "payment of expenses," that is an evasion beyond all cure, and it is hopeless to attack it.

Letts's Diaries for the coming year, 1866, are complete, as usual, with all the desirable conveniences of a day-book, suited to the habits of each particular class. The housekeeper's engagement-book is furnished with ruled spaces for registering all payments made to bakers, butchers, and grocers, wages to servants, rent and taxes of the house, with a list of provisions in season. The ready reference-journal, with blotting-paper between the pages, the neat portable diary, and the pretty little pocket-book, will each be found useful in its place.

RAILWAY STATISTICS.

A PARLIAMENTARY return, recently issued, supplies us with many interesting facts respecting the increase of railway traffic during the year 1864, as compared with the previous year.

In the first place, there were 12,389 miles of railway open in the United Kingdom in 1864, as compared with 12,078 miles in 1863. Of this 12,389 miles, 7462 were double and 3597 single lines of rail. As many as 222,272,165 persons travelled on these lines during the year 1864, as compared with 214,464,000 in 1863. Of the total number of 222,272,165 persons, 16,510,424 travelled first-class, 3,000,000 by parliamentary trains, 1,761,741 by season-ticket-holders, of whom there were 76,450 during 1864, and the remaining 200,000 by excursion trains during 1864 numbered 27,701,416; the second class, 63,269,163; and third, 136,591,581. Of the total number of 222,272,165 persons, 4,000,000 travelled 417,614 days. Of the total there were 2,700,337 cattle, 8,450,681 sheep, and 2,224,748 pigs conveyed during the year 1864, and 1,271,944 of cattle were carried on the railway during 1863. Of coal, coke, and other minerals, 71,448,781 tons were carried during 1864, and 68,000,000 tons during 1863.

The number of trains run were 4,803,949. About three eighths of these were merchandise trains, and five eighths passenger trains. First-class passengers travelled 45,661,310 miles; second-class travellers, 44,845,472; and third-class, 87,765,383 miles. The total number travelled 178,272,165. The receipts on account of conveyance of passengers, carriages, &c., amounted to £7,189,199, and the receipts from mails, £1,000,000. The receipts from merchandise, minerals, &c., amounted to £21,000,000. The total receipts were £29,189,199; and of general merchandise, £1,561,071.

The increase of receipts seems to have been general, and is not confined to any particular district. A reverse, however, is there a decrease observable in the receipts for 1864 as compared with 1863.

The Queen has been pleased to appoint the Right. Hon. Henry Austin Bruce to be Second Church Estates Commissioner, in the room of the Right Hon. Robert Arthur Talbot Gascoyne Cecil.

Mr. W. Matthews, vice-president of the Alpine Club, states that the society made on behalf of the Queen the purchase of all the rare and costly mountain which have been in the possession of the French Alpine Club Library.

Certain Ministerial changes are reported. Sir Robert Peel has been appointed Chief Secretary for Ireland, and Lord Lansdowne succeeds him. Mr. Gourlien has accepted the vice-presidency of the Board of Trade, in the room of Mr. Milner Gibson, who retires.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

BATHER large quantities of bullion have been sent into the Bank of England, and the Government believe having continued to absorb stock on account of the Sinking Fund, the Bank rate of discount was reduced on Thursday last from eight to seven per cent, and on upward tendency. The Unfunded Debt, however, has remained very little altered during the week.

The Exchequer Bills, which are now all issued at a reduced rate of interest, are discounted to 6 per cent. The discount houses have reduced their terms for deposits 5 to 4 per cent.

The Directors of the Bank of England have declared a dividend for the year.

The demand for money has been moderately active, at the annexed rates for the best descriptions:

Thirty days' bills	5½	per cent.	Four months' bills	5½ per cent.
Sixty days' bills	5½		Six months' bills	5½
Ninety days' bills	5½

In the Stock Exchange loans have been offered on Government securities at 6 per cent. The following are the closing prices of the leading Stocks and Shares to-day, but the quotations are well supported. We annex the rates in the leading foreign Securities:

	Closing prices.	Open market rates.		Closing prices.	Open market rates.
Consols	90 ¾	90 ¾	Turin	20 ½	20 ½
Reduced	90 ¾	90 ¾	Brussels	25	25
Three per Cents	90 ¾	90 ¾	Antwerp	25	25
New Three per Cents	90 ¾	90 ¾	Hamburg	37 ½	37 ½
Bank Stock	8	8	Madrid	15	15
India Stock	220	220	Amsterdam	12	12

The account of bullion has been on a fair average scale, and very little gold has been withdrawn for the Continent. The supply of silver has been large, and the price has declined to 61d. per oz. for the bar metal.

On Monday the funds were inactive, and at one time a shade lower in price than on Saturday last. Consols for money left off at 90 ¾ to ¾, and for the account 90 ¾ to ¾. Reduced, 90 ¾ to ¾. New Three per Cents, 90 ¾ to ¾. India Stock, 220 to 221. Bills, 20s. to 22s. discount. Exchequer Bills, 6 per cent. Bank Stock, 8 to 8 ½. Foreign Securities were dull. Turkish, 1858, 50 ½ to ¾. Ditto, 1862, 50 ½ to ¾. Ditto, 1863, 50 ½ to ¾. There was an improved feeling in the market on the following day, and Consols, for money, left off at 90 ¾ to ¾, and for the account 90 ¾ to ¾. Reduced, 90 ¾ to ¾. New Three per Cents, 90 ¾ to ¾. India Stock, 220 to 221. Bills, 20s. to 22s. discount. Exchequer Bills, for account, 6 per cent. Bank Stock, 8 to 8 ½. THE NEW JUDGE.

THE new Judge of the Court of Queen's Bench, Mr. Justice Lush, who has succeeded the late Mr. Justice Crompton, is a lawyer who has made his way from the humblest rank in the service of his profession; having been employed, originally, as an attorney's clerk, where he learnt the details of practice. At the age of twenty-nine, in November, 1836, he entered as a student of Gray's Inn, was admitted as special pleader a twelvemonth afterwards, and called to the Bar on the 18th of November, 1840. He soon obtained a considerable amount of practice on the Home Circuit, and in June, 1857, was made Queen's Counsel. Having attained his elevation to the Bench by mere application to the ordinary business of his profession, without the aid of political influence or patronage, his appointment is regarded with much satisfaction by the majority of working lawyers, both attorneys and barristers. He is a native of Shaftesbury, Dorsetshire, and fifty-eight years old. Mr. Justice Lush became also Sir Robert Lush on Monday last, when he received the honour of knighthood from her Majesty's hands at Windsor. The Portrait we have engraved is from a photograph by Messrs. J. and C. Watkins, of Parliament-street.

MR. JUSTICE LUSH, THE NEW JUDGE.

THE NEW SUSPENSION BRIDGE OVER THE RIVER MOLDAU, AT PRAGUE.

THE ceremony of laying the foundation-stone of the new suspension bridge which is to be erected over the River Moldau, at Prague, took place on the 19th ult. Our Illustration, from instantaneous photographs taken by Friedrich, of Prague, is given below. The act of laying the stone was performed by the Cardinal Archbishop of Prague (Prince Schwarzenberg), in the presence of the Deputy-Governor of Bohemia and of several dignitaries of the Church, attended by a numerous cortège of the clergy, all dressed in their official robes, and accompanied by several of the representatives of the Government. They went in procession from the Townhall, and crossed the river by a temporary bridge (shown in our Engraving) to the Belvedere side. Mass was here celebrated, and the stone was then lowered into its place, and mass was again celebrated by the Archbishop, who bestowed his benediction on the undertaking. A discharge of artillery gave a signal of the completion of the ceremony.

Towards the evening a banquet was given by the Mayor (Dr. Belsky), at which upwards of 300 people were present. The usual loyal toasts were drank, all the toasts being given in the Bohemian language. The Deputy-Governor of Bohemia, in proposing success to the engineers and the undertaking, remarked that, sixty years ago, a bridge was projected to occupy the same site as the present one; and then, as now, it was a design of English engineers which had been adopted; and the foundation-stone of the bridge laid this day by the Cardinal Prince Schwarzenberg was the very stone which had been prepared and destined for the same purpose in the case of the former bridge. After a lapse of sixty years, during which time it had been preserved and never lost its identity, it was actually applied to its intended use.

The town was illuminated in the evening, and an illuminated procession of boats descended the river to the site of the intended bridge. Festive bonfires were also lit up in various parts of the city.

The cost of the bridge, to be defrayed by the municipality of Prague, will be about £50,000. The Mayor (Dr. Belsky) and the Town Council have most heartily persevered in bringing this project into execution, and have, at last, the satisfaction of seeing the works actually commenced and in fair progress. The bridge is to be named, in honour of the Emperor, the "Franz Joseph's Brücke;" and the Emperor, at the request of the inhabitants of the city of Prague, has most graciously undertaken to open it when the structure is finished. The bridge is being built from the designs of Messrs. Ordish and Le Feuvre, of Westminster, who were successful against eleven competitors from Holland, Austria, Germany and France. When complete, the structure will be altogether of a novel character. It was for a long time supposed by scientific engineers that rigidity and suspension were entirely incompatible; but, by the aid of a catenary chain suspended above the main-chains and connected to them by vertical tie-rods, this important desideratum has been attained. The bridge constructed upon this principle have many new features when compared with ordinary suspension bridges. Unlike the modern suspension bridge at Chelsea, where the roadway narrows between the towers at each end, in this class of structure the roadway will remain of uniform width throughout. The longitudinal girders, also running parallel with the parapet-girders of most of the suspension bridges already constructed, will not appear in Ordish and Le Feuvre's bridge. In this case the main-chains incline from the summit of the towers in the direction of a straight line to the platform, which will render this structure different from every suspension bridge yet erected, as the main-chains of suspension bridges are invariably curved. The suspension portions of the structure will be entirely of steel, manufactured by Shortridge, Howell, and Co., of Sheffield, under their new process, and will afford the first example of a work of magnitude in which iron will have been superseded in this class of structure, by steel. The bridge will be in all respects similar to the Albert Bridge, which is being now constructed by the same engineers over the Thames, uniting Oakley-street, Chelsea, to Albert-road, Battersea Park. The contractors for the Prague bridge are Messrs. Ruston and Co., of Carolinenthal, Prague; and the superintendent, Mr. C. R. Wensely.

DISTRIBUTION OF PRIZES TO THE 20TH MIDDLESEX RIFLE VOLUNTEERS AT GUILDHALL ON SATURDAY LAST.

LADY ELIZABETH ROMILLY performed the ceremony of distributing the prizes to the best marksmen of the 20th Middlesex Rifle Volunteers (her Majesty's Customs Rifle Corps) in Guildhall last Saturday evening. Her Ladyship addressed the members of the corps as follows:—"Lieutenant-Colonel Grey, Officers, and Men of the 20th Middlesex Rifle Volunteers,—I presume it is from my husband's connection with the service of the customs that I have been asked to take part in the interesting ceremony of distributing these handsome prizes. I need hardly say with how much pleasure I accepted the invitation. I confess I had some hesitation at first, but that hesitation was overcome by the reflection that my friendship with several of the officers would ensure me instruction and assistance in the performance of my novel undertaking. With one of the officers, Lieutenant-Colonel Gregg, my friendship has been of many years' standing, so that it would have been ungracious in me to refuse any help in my power to general request. I know from general report how much the 26th Middlesex owes to Colonel Gregg's zeal and activity. Its first formation, a recent great increase in numbers, its prosperity, and its high position in regard to all those qualities for which a volunteer regiment desires to be distinguished, may all be justly ascribed to his exertions. Under these circumstances I have not thought it necessary to inquire, or even minutely to examine, whether the officers' Lieutenant-Colonel Gregg merits, or not, therefore, expect them from me; but a woman may claim to be a judge of what is agreeable in matters of appearance. On more than one occasion I have seen the regiment under arms, and I can say, without going beyond my proper province, that it was a most pleasing sight. It now only remains for me to thank you for the kind reception you have given me in addressing these few words to you." Her Ladyship then proceeded to distribute the first forty-six, were eighty in number, including some objects of intrinsic value. On the conclusion of the ceremony Lieutenant-Colonel Gregg hearty addressed the assembly. Sir T. Fremantle (chairman of the Board of Customs) congratulated the regiment on having fulfilled his prophecy of three years since by largely increasing their numbers since that time. In conclusion, a vote of thanks was passed to the Lord Mayor and corporation, and three cheers were given to Lady Elizabeth Romilly.

EXHIBITION OF THE UNITED HORTICULTURAL SOCIETY AT GUILDHALL—SEE NEXT PAGE

THE FLOWER-SHOW AT GUILDHALL

The United Horticultural Society, which has lately introduced the pleasant institution of flower-shows in the Asbestos Arcade at the gates of the City, was permitted by the Corporation of London to hold its fourth exhibition on Tuesday last week, in Guildhall, with the praiseworthy object of obtaining funds for the relief of gardeners and workmen in calamity, old age, or sickness; and the Lord Mayor himself not only gave a subscription to the fund, but came in person, accompanied by the Sheriffs and attended by the usual civic retinue, to the private view at noon of that day. His Lordship was received at the door by members of the other citizens of the society, who explained the benevolent object of the show, and stated that the exhibition would be continued from day forward, without any hope of obtaining prizes, in order that the whole sum received might be appropriated to the charitable purpose. The principal organizers of the show were Messrs. Marshall, Cute, and Ribbons; and the chief exhibitors Messrs. Jas. Veitch, Cutbush, Wood, Mr. Hibberd (potatoes); Mr. Bull (new plants); Mr. F. Graham, Enfield (fruit); Messrs. Williams and Lowe (ferns); Mr. Turner (plants); and Mr. Forsyth (grounds, &c.). The hardy cryanthemums are said to be especial in this season of the year, took the most prominent place amongst the flowers. These plants are now so numerous as to be almost innumerable, and the beauty of the several species quite astonished the visitors. The leaves and flowers are of the most stable for form and colour. There was a splendid collection, including twenty varieties of the show pompone, the Japanese, the large and fully paine, and yuccas, and vigorous, and orchids, and sacuba japonica, all clustered up against the wall in most picturesque style, and make one almost fancy that he stood in the conservatory at Kew or the "Tropical Region" of the Crystal Palace. Large collections were shown by Mr. Bull, was remarkable for its splendid display of Japanese, crimson berries. Amongst the fruits and edible roots Mr. Graham showed no less than one hundred varieties of potatoes, and Messrs. Lane and splendid hothouse grapes, pears, and pines; and Mr. Forsyth an extraordinary collection of gourds, upwards of 1000 in number, and containing nearly 500 varieties. Mr. Hibberd, to whose exertions the success of the show is principally attributed, had brought some remarkably fine potatoes, thus completing a judicious mixture of the useful with the beautiful. Taken altogether, the show was one of extraordinary freshness and attraction, considering the advanced period of the year, and, being established in the ancient Guildhall in the novelty of all its recently-added decorations, it made a very brilliant scene when lighted up at night.

RESTORATION OF THE GUILDHALL OF THE CITY OF LONDON.

The progress of this costly work has been, from time to time, recorded in the Illustrated London News; and now that the restoration virtually have already been held beneath the new roof—the main feature of the restoration, and that which led to several others—and the entire redecoration of the ancient edifice. This is, altogether, a work of such great magnificence, as to render it worthy of special commemoration in our picturesque chronicle of the time. The Guildhall is familiar to every lover of old London: it is second striking character of its events renders it of national as well as civic claim.

The Guildhall, or hall for the meeting of the Guilds, says Mr. Horace Cotes, the City architect, is of very ancient date, the first entry he has been able to find is in the year 1212, the 14th of John. It is in a wall of the Hustings Court, which has been here, and must have been a very large building, from the number of persons it was to have been present. "This," says Mr. Jones, "was undoubtedly, the original Guildhall spoken of by Fabyan, Stow, and others, and of which Henry Fourth, or Hall continued, and the Courts of the Mair and Aldermen were continually holden there, as they are at present in the Aldermanbury. This we will call the first Guildhall."

The second Guildhall, according to the construction records, was built in 1326, the 20th Edward II. Part of the crypt of this building exists, though much defaced by fire; it extended to the present Great hall, and adjoins the present crypt, being divided by a stout brick wall. We might reasonably infer from the position that the second building was a part, or occupied a part, of the present site. In Agas's Map, 1560, there is a representation of the entry from Aldermanbury. There was no entry for carriages, or even an opening to the Guildhall-street, as now.

We now come to the present, or third Guildhall, "begun to be builded new," says Fabyan, in the year 1411, the 12th of Henry IV., "by Thomas Knolles, then Mayor, and by his brethren and commonalty, and the same was made of a little cottage and a large and great house, as it now stands." The cost was £3,700, including purchases, fines, and amercements. The Mayor's Court and Chambers were added, and, as stately entrances were required, the two gateways of stone. Divers aldermen glazed the windows, as appeared by their arms painted on each. Among the individual contributions was the making and glazing of "two lovers," for which Sir W. Harryng, Alderman of the ward, the hall was twenty years in building; the kitchen was built "by procurement" from the companies, as Stow says. Shaw, goldsmith, Mayor, knighted on Bosworth Field; and the kitchen was first used for dressing Sir John's banquet on entering office. It is clear that the first that kept his feast there."

In the fire the open oak roof was entirely destroyed, and the principal front much injured. "That night (Tuesday, Sept. 1, 1666), the night of Guildhall was a fearful spectacle, which stood the whole body of it together in view for several hours before the hall was taken it, without flame; it supposed because the timber was of such solid oak), and it burned inwards, and fell in a mass of gold or a great building from the upper part of the clustered columns, which subsequently bore Gudderon shells with the arms of the twelve great companies. After the fire an additional story was raised to the lofty pitch of the original roof, the ceiling covering the whole hall and square panelled. Eight circular-headed windows on each side were added. These alterations have been described by Mr. Christopher Wren: this is doubted by Mr. Horace Jones. We perceive that Jones acknowledges "the modern roof and ceiling of Guildhall" to be Wren's, but "built over it in haste and for immediate use, and evidently a temporary covering." (See "Wren and his Times," p. 206.) The present mongrel front of Guildhall was erected by Mr. George Dance, the City architect, in 1789.

The chief approach to the hall was by a two-storied porch, far in advance of the main building. It had been much altered in the reign of Elizabeth or James I. It had, on each side of the entrance, two ornamented niches, and two figures in other niches, with figures in the upper story. These figures were taken down by Dance in 1789, and they lay in a cellar until Alderman Boydell induced the Corporation, in 1854, to restore them to pass into the hands of Thomas Banks, the eminent sculptor, who added them to the other statues as works of art; and after his death, in 1809, they were purchased by Mr. Banks, M.P. These figures have been placed in the screen at the east end of the hall. The crypt beneath is the finest and most extensive now remaining in London. Its height is 13 ft. 9 in. from the ground to the centre of the arches. In 1841 the stonework was rubbed down and cleaned, and the clustered shafts and capitals were repaired, and then in the visit of the present Majesty to the City, July 9, 1851, a banquet was served to the Queen and suite in this crypt, which was characteristically decorated for the occasion. This crypt is the only important portion of the ancient edifice. At various times, and in various years, in the chambers and offices all sorts of styles and decorations have been introduced—Gothic, Italian, and mixed styles, and marble sculpture, and mean wall-decoration; and the floors are of various materials. The interior of Great Hall, in the same imitation of the nave of Winchester Cathedral, was also poor and mean.

For more than 150 years did the citizens bear the reproach of having their ancient Hall disgraced by the flimsiness, ugliness, and poverty that roof. A pointed roof was modelled, but was proceeded with no further. With increasing pudge, which the country house understood. The country was dilapidated and unsightly, and its removal was the general wish of the Court of Common Council. Both by Mr. Deputy Lott, F.S.A., as well as a work of necessity as in connection with the new roof, and in harmony with its architecture itself, and was therefore offensive to architectural and archæological taste.

At length a committee of the Court of Common Council, to whom the subject had been referred, presented a report on a plan of extensive improvements, involving the entire reconstruction, on a new plan, of the roof of Great Hall, and the restoration of the upper part of that roof. A pointed roof was modelled, but was proceeded with no further. With increasing pudge, which the country house understood. children, and other refugees, have been got in and saved. All our most important work being thus done, and the troops comfortably established in their barracks, we had for the first time a night of quiet and rest, on the night of Sunday, the 15th of October.

A detachment of the 6th Hoyals, under Colonel Hobbs, having gone up into the country from Port Antonio, found Sicosey Gut already deserted by the insurgents, and occupied by the troops from Port Morant. Colonel Hobbs then proceeded towards Mocklands—a position some distance inland, on the line of the Stoney Mountain Valley. In reporting this movement, the Governor states that Colonel Hobbs "had seen and shot a good many rebels, as well as captured some prisoners."

At daybreak on Monday, Oct. 16, a court-martial sat to try prisoners, and twenty-seven were found guilty. The Governor's report of this day's work I think it requisite to extract the proclamation of martial law to Kingston; but he observes, "I was not myself able to personally point to be decided upon. Throughout my tour I found everywhere the most unanimous feeling that the Bay Rebellion had originated in coloured member of the House of Assembly, had not only been mixed up in the matter, but was himself, through his own misrepresentations and seditious language addressed to the ignorant black people, the chief cause and origin of the whole rebellion. Mr. Gordon was now in Kingston, and it became necessary to decide what action should be taken with regard to him. Having obtained a deposition on oath that certain seditious printed notices had been sent through the post-office directed to him, handwriting to the parties who have been leaders in the rebellion, I at once called upon the Custos to issue a warrant for his arrest. For some little time he managed to evade capture, but, finding that, sooner or later, it was certain to be executed, he left the house of General O'Connor and there gave himself up. I at once had him placed on board the Wolverine for safe custody, and conveyed to the Bay. Great difference of opinion prevailed in Kingston as to the policy of taking Mr. Gordon. Scarcely all considered him to be at all less the occasion of the rebellion, and that he ought to be taken, but many of the inhabitants were under considerable apprehension that his capture might lead to an immediate outbreak in Kingston itself. I did not share in this feeling. Moreover, considering it right in the abstract, and desirable as a matter of example, that the coloured black men who had been misled were undergoing condign punishment the chief instigator of all the evil should not go unpunished, I at once took upon myself the responsibility of his capture." By a postscript, we learn that Mr. Gordon was tried by the court-martial at Morant Bay, sentenced to death, with the deliberate approval of the Governor, and executed on the 23rd of October, at the latest accounts from the island.

Our illustrations consist of a general view of Morant Bay; a view of Port Morant, with the ruined Courthouse, from a sketch by Mr. Cyprian Bridge, R.N.; and a view of the Hoolley Estate, taken by Messrs. J. E. Hawkins and Co., photographers, of Spanish Town, Jamaica. They will be regarded as interesting in connection with this sad affair.

THE ATTACK OF SPAIN ON CHILI

VALPARAISO, Oct. 3.

SPAIN has declared war against Chili, and Chili has accepted the war. Valparaiso and all the principal ports of Chili are in a bombardment is threatened. Trade has come to a standstill; every one who can manage to do so is leaving the country before the ball appeared; all the banks have stopped for want of funds; in fact, not the most sanguine can see a ray of hope upon us, like an oasis in a desert lighting; and Valparaiso, which but a fortnight since was teeming with life and activity, will, in a few days, be a city of the dead. What I am going to do, I don't know; I must resolve something. But now I will, as well, try to give you some account of how we have come about. As to the dates, I may not be quite correct; but you may rely on the main points of my story.

About two years ago a small Spanish squadron, under the command of Admiral Pinzon, made its appearance on this coast. It was announced as a purely scientific squadron, and, as much as we received the officers and the Admiral were feted and feasted, and all went merry as a marriage bell. It is true, that there was a few gruff rudeness, soon made himself disliked, and even hated, by his own countrymen as well as the Chilians. He was, as we found out a few hot, ugly rumours were afloat, that the object of their visit to the neighbouring Republic of Peru was one of hostility against Spain. But, as they had been met with a hearty greeting, so they left with a hearty good-by from the people of Chili. They had brought with them geologists, botanists, and astronomers, and others, who, as it has since appeared, were merely spies, and who in the name of science examined the land and harbours for the real objects of the expedition. The squadron went to Peru, and was there well received, but with a certain coolness. As soon as the news ascribed to the news of Admiral Pinzon's behaviour here having gone before him; but we now know that one of the objects of the Spanish expedition was already known there in official quarters. The squadron then visited Callao, in the Pacific, and next touched at Rio Janeiro. By that time it was openly said that, on leaving this port, they would again proceed to Callao and seize the Chincha Islands. They left Rio for that purpose. Now, it is well known to every one that the Chinchas had been seized as a material guarantee that Peru should have satisfied certain claims which Spain had made against her. The excitement here on the receipt of the news was intense. In this city meetings were held, and warlike steps taken for Peru. The Chili Government protested against this robbery, and one private establishment refused to supply the Spanish squadron, while the Government here declared real contraband of war. A sanguinous conflict with no one but a weak enemy to deal with (not by notice of) was published here, in which, it must be confessed, the Spanish Queen and her Ministers were greatly insulted. I must allow, too, that the Spanish Ambassador to Peru was wished on that country; strictness was observed in preventing similar help reaching the Spaniards. But all these things were certainly not strictly legal; but there was nothing which has not been done elsewhere under similar circumstances, and certainly nothing to call for the threat of explanation when the first excitement should have passed. Towards the end of April the Peruvian representative here received a letter from M. Tavira, the Spanish Minister at Santiago, backed by the presence of a frigate in the Valparaiso harbour, which was to remain there, if no negotiations were many times on the point of being broken off; but at last, on May 20, M. Tavira declared himself satisfied with the explanations given by M. Covarrubias, the Chilian Minister of Foreign Affairs, and every one considered the matter over, not doubting that M. Tavira's acceptance of the explanations would be ratified by his Government. Business, which had received a slight check pending the negotiations, went ahead again with renewed vigour. Every one in Chili had never looked more healthy than when, on Sept. 12, an express arrived from Callao with the news that the Spanish Legation on board, bringing, as the only despatch, a copy of the Spanish Times and Herald, in which was the news of M. Tavira and the non-recognition by his Government of the explanations he had agreed to were satisfactory. It appeared that a large Spanish squadron, under Admiral Pareja, an Admiral and Ambassador, had left Cadiz, and that the intention of demanding immediate and complete satisfaction in the most peremptory manner; and, if not conceded, of proceeding at once to extremities. On the arrival of the news of the rupture, soon after, this news was confirmed; and on the 17th of September, the first day of the last annual fête in honour of anniversary of the independence of Chili, at twelve o'clock, just as the salute was being fired, the Spanish Villa de Madrid and Blanca Canales, the two best Venezolos, made their appearance round the point. Admiral Pareja immediately sent his demands on shore in the form of an ultimatum demanding explanations on certain of the points already mentioned; but requiring, as a preliminary step, that the fort should salute the Spanish flag, which he was kind enough to say should be immediately returned from one of his vessels. He also required that the negotiations should be carried on on board his flagship. The time granted for an answer was four days, on the expiry of which the blockade was to commence. The fort refused to salute, and I never saw the people more orderly or more enthusiastic. The answer of the Chilian Government was to the effect that they had no such terms, and a notice that the blockade would be accepted by Chili as a declaration of war. On Sunday, the 19th, the blockade was declared, and on Tuesday, the 21st, the declaration of war was published with all pomp, and with the greatest enthusiasm, in all the towns to which the news could be forwarded in time.

I incline you a View of the Plaza de la Intendencia here, in which the declaration of war by the President was read. The place was lined with soldiers, and artillery, and in the centre was the Prussian Minister, on horseback, surrounded by his staff. Opposite to him the Peruvian read the proclamation they were all cheering, and the soldiers presented arms to the Chilian flag.

On the 1st inst. the new Banco National commenced the issue of paper money, which they are by their charter authorized to do to the extent of 50 per cent beyond their paid-up capital—90,000 dols. This is further secured by the deposit with the Chilian Government of investment and other bonds, as well as the guarantee of the Banks de Valparaiso and de Chili. Mr. Agustin Edwards, the former banker in Chili. the Government offices will receive them in payment of duties, and the Banks which have issued them themselves have also agreed to receive them at par; but all this, I fear, will not, in the war we are commencing, keep up the public confidence in them. The Banco National has furnished the other banks with a supply of notes on their depositing bonds and shares in the hands of Government as security; but, unfortunately, the value of these is also considerably shaken. The enthusiasm is great, all, from the highest to the lowest, being anxious to take up arms and offering their services to the Government. A national subscription has been commenced, which, already in Santiago alone, exceeds 100,000 dols. The people of Chili are equal to the war, and it is my firm belief that the Chilians, not deterred by the immediate sacrifice, are prepared to go through with the contest once again. But what is to become of us poor foreigners while all this is going on? We have large interests here, and many whose interests are fixed in this country, where they have lived so peacefully, caused by this war.

I will not attempt to discuss whether in the disputed question Chili is right or wrong, or whether the demands presented by Mr. Tavira were really satisfactory. I can only say that the most abject humiliation was submitted to by Chili in the enquiries of the Minister on the terms proposed by Admiral Pareja, and certainly not the hotheaded, unthinking people of Chili. The people of Chili, therefore is not among the number. Congress immediately voted supplies, and has given to the President the power to borrow money, and to carry on the war with vigour. But, unfortunately, the Spaniards are on the sea, where Chili has no defence, and the only hope before a blow can be struck by Chili. The Spaniards have always declared that their object was not war, but that "the ball was run in—five English and one French; English flag, which was hauled down with cheers by the Spaniards. The diplomatic body has made many energetical and powerful protests against these high-handed proceedings, but Pareja accepts the responsibility of it all. The Consul of the home country has sent the unanimous protests of their representatives. The greatest sufferers by the war are the Chilians. You are aware that the chief part of the railways and other industrial undertakings in this country belong to foreigners, and the Chilian coasting traders are also owned by foreigners, while the greater part of the trade are worked by foreign capital. The statistical tables will show to what extent foreigners are interested in the ordinary trade of this country, both export and import; and it is very much to be feared that a considerable proportion of this in the others should be jeopardized on a mere question of forms and etc. Mr. Tavira, the Spanish Minister, left for Montevideo, and the Spain, which chooses to play at being a great maritime Power among the nations of the earth. The Spanish squadron, with the first appearance of the Spaniards on this coast some of the newspapers here declared that it was the duty of every man to take up a musket of part or the whole of her once illused colonies. Those who said so were then looked upon as fools. Now I and every one else are now convinced that they were right. Now, however unsatisfactory is the condition of affairs in the South American Republics, none of them are far afraid of Spain but Chili, and Chili, as the only naval Power, Bolivia, is better off than when under Spanish rule. But, as I before said, the days of Chili are numbered, for she has to contend within a very few weeks, or even days, it will be complete and beyond redemption. Her ports will be in the hands of Spain, her coasting will be left in a few days but a few foreign vessels, hulks, and steamers will be left in the harbour, and starvation and bankruptcy in the distance.

The two illustrations engraved on page 504 are from the Views above mentioned, which were taken by our correspondent, Mr. C. E. Rowell, Photographic artist, a resident at Valparaiso for twelve years past; the view of the harbour and bay was taken with Johnson's panoscopic camera.]

THE SENSATION OF BEING MURDERED.

MR. SEWARD and his son, says the New York correspondent of the Spectator, were driving in a carriage together, when they were set upon by assassins at the time of the attempted assassination.

Mr. Frederick Seward was in the act of stepping from his bed-room into the passage, and seeing the assassin, he merely wondered what he was doing there, when the assassin struck him on the forehead with the butt-end of a revolver, and he fell senseless. Mr. Seward's son, on seeing the assassin, drew a revolver, which he presented at Mr. Frederick Seward's head. Before he could fire, the assassin struck him on the forehead with the butt-end of his revolver, and he fell senseless. The man pulled the trigger, but it only snapped, and his victim was saved. Mr. Seward's son was now in the act of rising, when the third of confusion, and, being upon the floor, resting upon his right arm, he fired at the assassin. The ball entered the assassin's right cheek, and the assassin had felled him to the floor with the butt of the pistol—he put his left hand to his face, and, finding that he was wounded, he exclaimed, "I am mine fire, after all." Then he became insensible, and remained so for two days and nights. Mr. Seward's son, on recovering consciousness, said, "For goodness' sake, who are you the ball out?" after which he fell back insensible. Mr. Seward, on hearing the first shot, immediately left his bed-room, and, on seeing the assassin, who was in the act of striking Frederick Seward, who was Assistant Secretary of State, had asked his fellow-man proposed to assassinate Mr. Seward, and had provided himself with a knife which was to take place the next day. Mr. Seward gave him the points of a knife in the throat, and the assassin fell to the floor, and Mr. Seward saw that the President's table, and Mr. Lincoln that afternoon wrote out the reply; and Mr. Seward, on hearing the report of the pistol, and the exclamation of the British Minister by President Johnson which was regarded at the time by the British Minister as premeditated murder, and which was afterwards fully dispelled, Mr. Frederick Seward's first impression after he came fully to his senses was that the British Minister had shot him. Mr. Seward's daughter, who was in the house at the time, thought that only one night had passed, since he knew not what had happened to him, and that he had been asleep, and knew it had not been.

Mr. Seward's mental experience during his supposed assassination was in the highest degree curious. He says that he was conscious of a sensation of consternation and observation of minute particulars is not common in circumstances of extraordinary excitement. Immediately after Seward was lying upon his side, close to the edge of his bed, with his head resting in a corner, which had been made by the turning down of the sheet, and his face from pressure. He was trying to keep awake, having been seized upon by a strong inclination to sleep, when he felt a sharp pain across the cheek-bone. He was thoroughly conscious of the cruelty in the passage-way, followed by the entrance of the assassin and the struggle with his son. He was conscious of the presence of the assassin at his bedside, when he first appeared above his face, and then his thought was, "What handsome cloth that overcoat is made of!" The assassin's face then appeared, and the incident stantaneously thought, "What a handsome man!" (Payne was a fine-looking fellow.) Then came a sudden sense of cutting his throat from ear to ear, side of his face and neck, then quickly the same upon the other side, but he felt no severed pain. This was the moment's impression. Then followed, in night, "My time has come," and, falling from the bed to the floor, fainted, but was conscious of falling. He remembered no more for a moment, and then that "it rained, good." Mrs. Seward was giving him tea with a spoon, and he was in a sitting posture, supported by pillows. He was conscious that he pushed the spoon away, and that Mrs. Seward was alarmed at his consciousness, and that he desired to speak. They brought him a porcelain pencil and paper, and he wrote, "I know all. I am not dead. I am well." And from that moment he has slowly but steadily recovered health and strength.

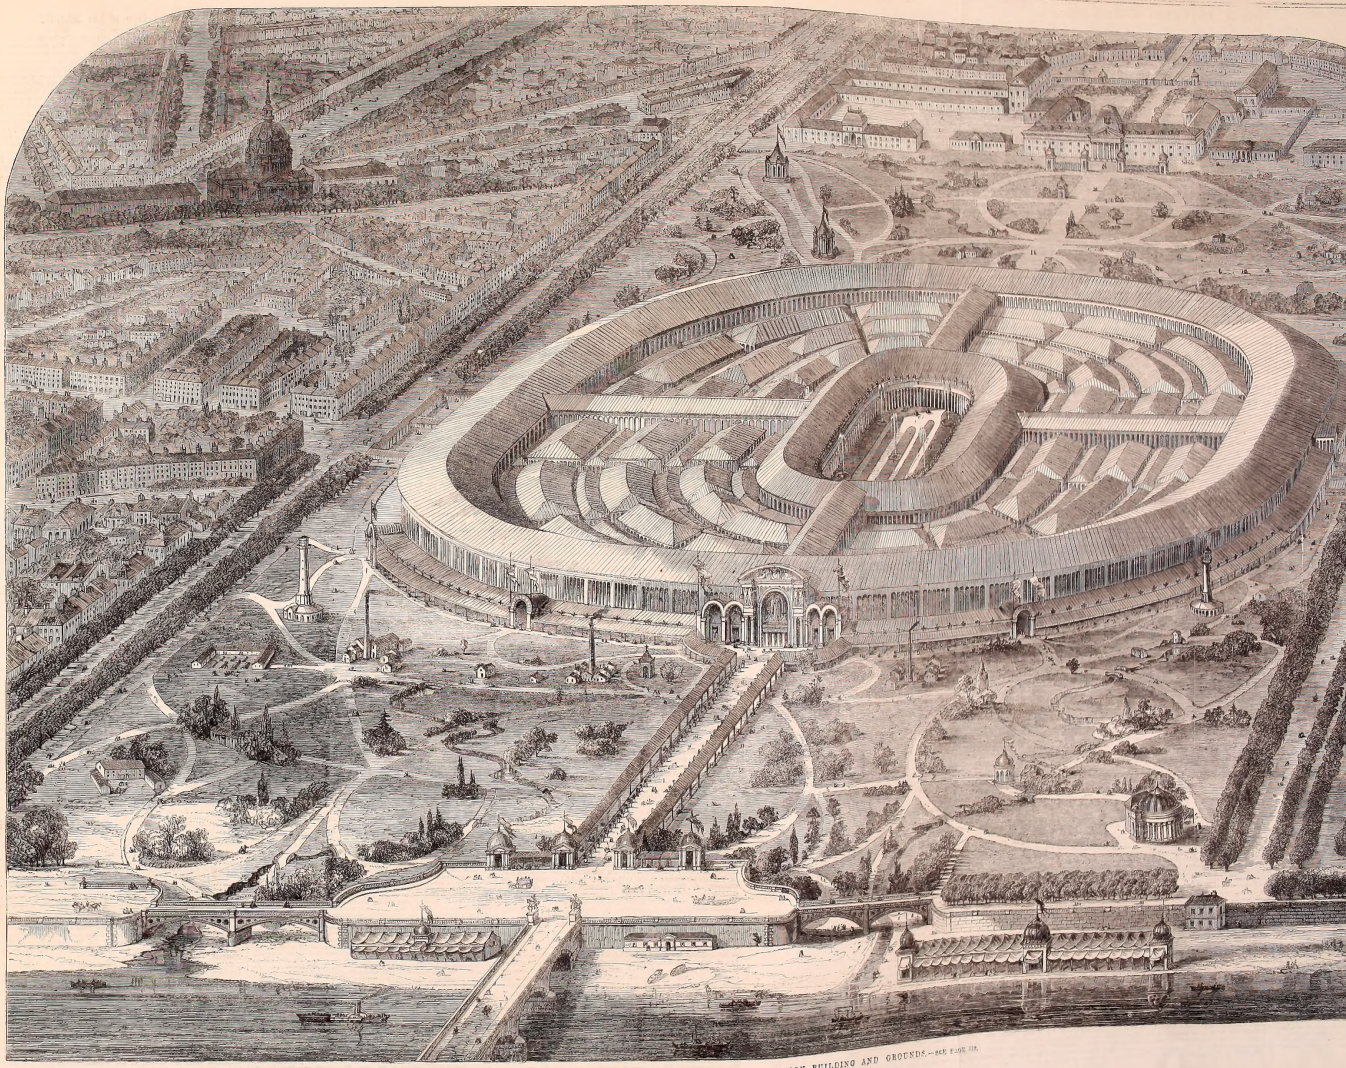
The Postmaster-General of New Zealand has issued his report for the year 1864. The total number of letters received at the various post-offices in the colony reached 2,151,711, and the number despatched 2,147,300, showing an increase of 10 per cent over the previous year. The 210,780 letters passed through the Auckland post-office were more than the post offices of New Zealand, and their number was rather greater than the number of letters in circulation in Victoria. The revenue amounted to £147,300, whereof £64,000 went for subsidies to intercolonial steamers. The expenses was only £39,805. Nearly 47000 was lost by the system of franking letters.

Archæology of the Month.

THE first meeting of the Society of Antiquaries for the session was held on the 16th.—Mr. Frederic Ouvry, V.P., in the chair—when the genuineness of the famous "Paston Letters," recently impugned in the Fortnightly Review by Mr. Hermann Merivale, was the subject of the evening. The secretary, Mr. Christopher Knight Watson, stated that he had put himself in communication with Mr. Watson, stated that the most competent person to decide as to the internal evidence of the Letters; and Mr. Alnsuck, who there was reason to believe could speak as to the external evidence, in consequence of his long residence in that part of England where the Paston family lived, and his acquaintance with Mr. Dalton, the intimate friend of Sir John Fenn, who helped him in the publication of the Letters. In the mean time, Mr. Philip Frere, the literary representative of Sir John Fenn, instituted a search among the papers of his father, Mr. Edward Frere, who edited the fifth volume of the Letters; and the result has been the discovery of the manuscript of the Letters, together with a mass of undated letters, and other documents connected with the publication of the whole. They were found at Mr. Frere's residence at Bungay, Cambridgeshire. The late Serjeant Frere could never find the originals of the fifth volume, but he was always convinced that he could find into the hands of his son, Philip, then a schoolboy, and taught him to read and decipher them. Afterwards, in 1830, he forwarded such documents as he had to the Bishop of Norwich, for the learned prelate's inspection. Very recently, however, Mr. Philip Frere found a box, about 2 ft. square, marked "Paston Letters," which proved to be the specimen sent to the Bishop; below them were various undated documents of the greatest interest, such as household memoranda; rentals; and in another tier the long-missing originals of the fifth volume. The letter of Margaret Paston against Sir John is referred to the appearance of "Peter Pattern" falls to the ground. The evidence will, therefore, be in favour of the Letters as a whole. Mr. Bruce Cull has promised to use his personal influence with Mr. Frere to obtain this original volume. Mr. Ouvry also read the MSS. with Serjeant Frere and contrasted the originals with the printed letters. This was done in 1835. The letters were printed in 1836, and after his death he (Mr. Cull) still unpublished; he well remembered they were kept in a box which was known to be full of Paston Letters.

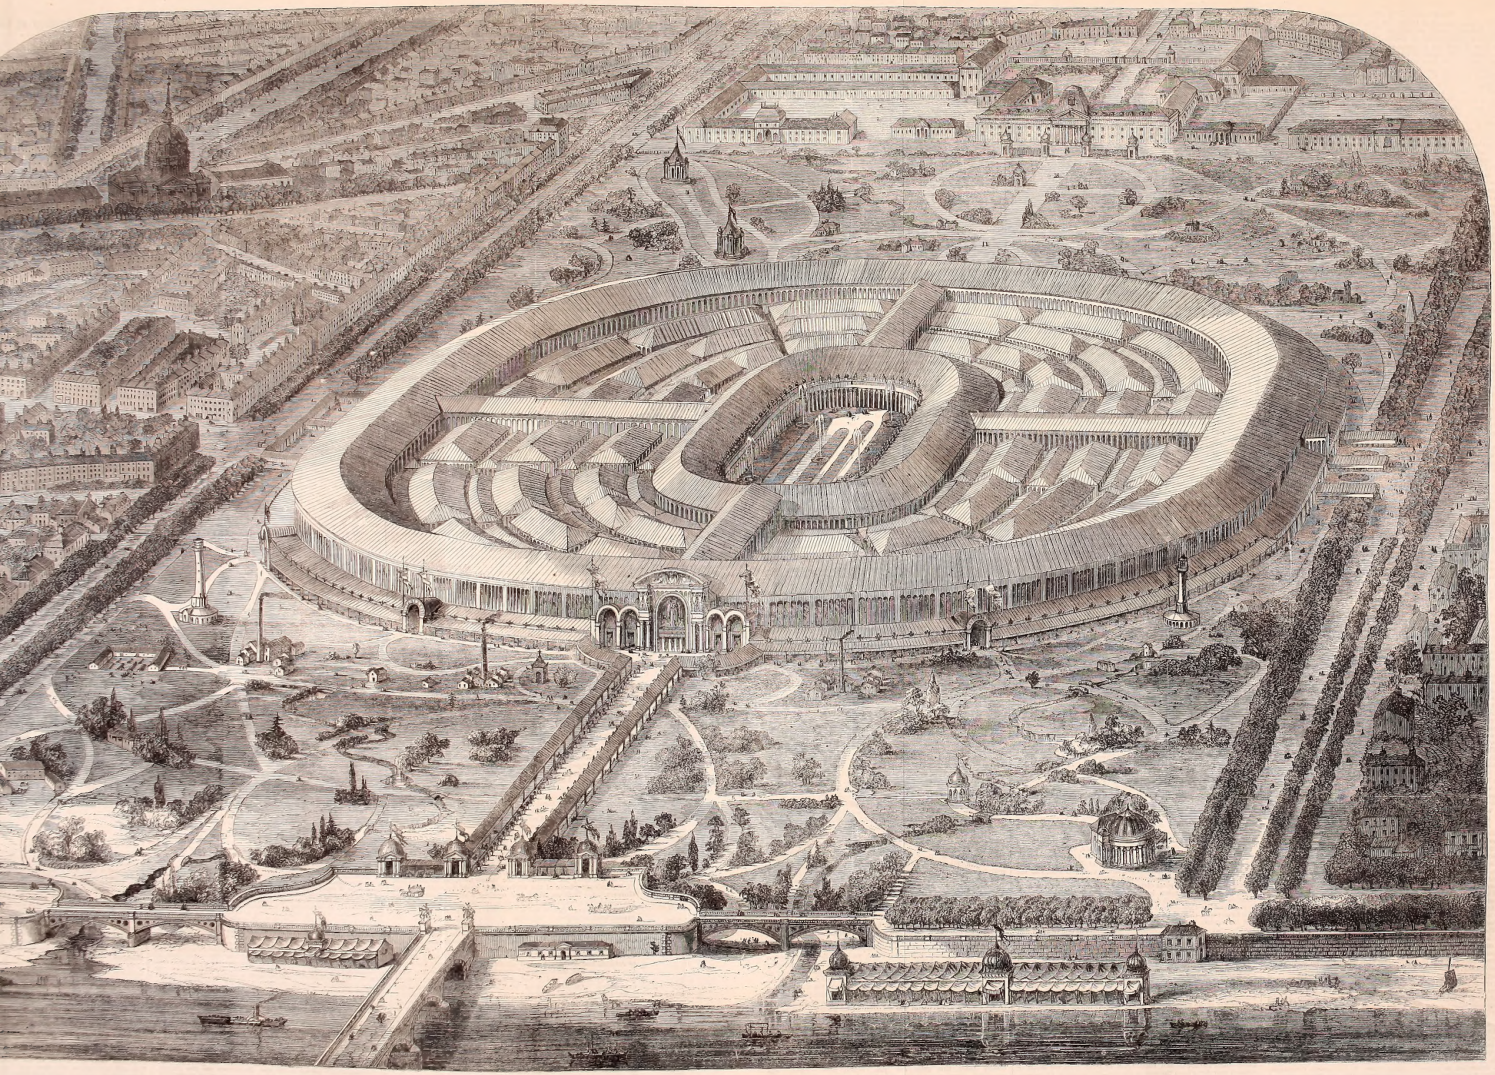
There has just been added to the museum established in the library of the British Museum, at Bloomsbury, Rudsmill, a valuable and interesting collection of antiquities, found in the neighbourhood of the Steelyard, Dowgate, and other parts of London Wall. These remains have been collected by Mr. Gunston, of Islington, and arranged in cases by the curators. They consist of Roman fibulæ, armlets, rings, and other personal ornaments; a number of keys, box-locks, hinges, and other articles, bronze and iron; steelyards, scales, textiles or bobbins for weaving, tablets or tablets, and styli or pens for writing. There are many specimens of ancient glass; very fine Samian-ware bowls and vases, ornamented with figures of war and the chase; bloodstained pavements, bricks, tiles, fireplaces, &c. In the Early British department is a collection of arrow-heads, or pilgrim-tops, probably unique, and of undoubted authenticity; among the finest is a flint-chipped arrow-head discovered in the bed of the Thames while exhuming on one side the martyrdom of St. Thomas à Becket, and on the other the effigies of St. Dunstan. A full pontifical, giving the Roman hieroglyphic with right hand holding in his left a crozier. Next is the equestrian effigy of Richard II., in complete armour, and the King full faced, with a beard, a crown on his head, and a sceptre in his right hand, the hoofs of his horse is there with the figure of St. George. Next is the head and bust of Thomas à Becket, attired in his pontifical robes, beneath a canopy, supported by angels. Then the figure of Christ upon the cross, the limbs of which terminate in fleurs-de-lis. Here are likewise a full-length female figure in a long robe, and a head of Edward the Confessor and knife of the time of Edward III.; another figure of an ecclesiastic in copes, and a female figure. The series of keys, box-locks, and spurs is rich, and of early date, beginning with the Pyke spur. A collection of Roman fibulæ, and a fine bronze fibula of the time of William III., is very curious. Most of these relics are nicely displayed in cases. In the library a series of Early English seals and matrices, and prominently represents the archæological interest and value of this varied collection of our ancient London antiquities.

The subject of Bushill-field burial-ground has been again brought before the Metropolitan Board of Works. Dr. Deppé (Finsbury), M.D., has narrated to the Court an eloquent precis of the history of Bunhill-field, declaring that it was the first public burial-ground, a Dissenters' cemetery. Though John Bunyan, Isaac Watts, Knollys, and Lardner were buried there, a portion of the ground has been appropriated, and Bishop Ken had officiated in it; and that could be called the burial-place of a party which had now become the State Church. Westwood, Blake, and Lieut. Reed then moved that the ground should remain one of the open spaces of the metropolis, without disturbance; and that the Corporation should undertake to become trustees of the same, to be by them taken care of and secured from being perverted to secular uses for ever—which was carried, and carried unanimously.



Some very interesting discoveries have recently been made in Yorkshire, at Stack, near Pontefract, in Lancashire, and in France. From Halifax, but known to antiquaries as the Roman station of Cambodunum, Aldborough, and Isurium, in Yorkshire, a Roman building were excavated. Other relics have been found in the neighbourhood. Lancashire is rich in the formation of the Historical Archæological Association, chiefly with the view of making further excavations. The Association has a good start.

The non employed have laid bare the walls of a building 38 ft. by 30 ft., in width, at certain points, as much as 3 ft. in height. The floors are internal walls, and a paved court. In the space between the inner paved court and the outer wall, a hypocaust was found. In it was a very handsome circular chamber a silver coin of Vespasian, in good preservation; and another of Titus, in bad. Fragments of bronze fibulæ, of broken Samian pottery, bricks, and tiles have been turned up. Some of them bear the inscription, "COH. III. VAL." Mr. Roach Smith, a member of the Council of the Association, that this was the site of the garrison of the 4th Cohort of the Vangiones, a German nation. Numerous sculptured stones described have led to the discovery of a hypocaust, 24 ft. long by 20 ft. wide; and the floor of the chamber was composed of concrete, with tiles above, and the floor of the passage was of flagstones. Heating flues and passages, as far as they have been uncovered, are also discovered. Among the relics found are a bronze fibula, a fibula and a stylus, and some portions of human bones. Other cuttings have laid bare the outer wall of the camp, the ditch, and the vallum, and the second ditch discovered. Another hypocaust similar to the last has been found. In one corner, enveloped in wool, was a bundle of metal, which, on being submitted to scientific tests, turns out to be galena lead ore. It weight about 250 lb. By the side of the bundle was a bronze coin of Antoninus Pius, and a fragment of a child.



A return to the House of Commons of Irish land has been printed, of "The Charities of the Cities of London and Westminster." The document is stated to contain the information which would be the most available for the public benefit, and the following instances are oddly enough:—"Bull-baiting, Bear-baiting, Badger-baiting, and Cock-fighting. Death left £3 'to one old washerwoman; also presentations to Christ's Hospital, on the nomination of Governors." The Drapers' Company, £1 6s. 8d. is left 'to the sexton for tolling her bell before an execution at Tyburn.'"

At the opening meeting of the new session of the Archæological Institute were exhibited the most important objects disinterred at Cheshunt (Hertfordshire), during the autumn excursion of the Society. These articles consisted of Roman combs, spindle-whorls, fibulæ, styli, lance-heads, and other objects of iron, bronze, and bone; pots, parts of a steelyard, upwards of 200 Roman coins, and some Anglo-Saxon relics, also of iron. Chelwood, an unpublished work, and one of the earliest examples of imitation of the Roman colonage.

The Bristow Collection, which has just been dispersed by Messrs. Christie, Manson, and Woods, contained some porcelain of high character, including fifteen plates of the finest old Chelsea, golden and gold, painted with fruit and birds, from Lord Cadogan's collection, realized the handsome sum of £110 5s. A pair of hexagonal vases and covers, of old Worcester, gros bleu, pencilled with gold, and painted with birds and insects, 10 guineas. A pair of magnificent Sèvres vases and covers, cameo-like in appearance, and flowers in colours on a white ground, 56 in. high, of rare and exactly right proportions, with a pair of pale-turquoise Sèvres, painted with pastoral subjects on gros bleu ground, 310 guineas.

MEMBERS OUT OF PARLIAMENT.

CAN anyone learned in things not generally known trace the connection between charity and dining? Although hypercrites assert that we know nothing about it, the English are essentially a dining people. It may be that the accounts of hecatombs of underdone meat, and magnificent half cooked au naturel, which our neighbours set down as the staple of our feasting, has become rather a caricature, yet no Frenchman would probably allow that we have acquired the art of dining; it is only the system which we practise. The ordinary charity dinner, in the course of the season, is not a social institution, worse, well; for many a man who would not in cold blood bestow anything on an orphanage or a hospital, after what has been to him a sensuatory feast will give liberally out of the abundance, not of his heart, but of an organ a little lower in his body. Something of this would seem to prevail at Bristol, and to be the explanation of a triple-caste dinner annually in honour of the great local benefactor, Edward Colston; the secondary object of the gathering being to obtain subscriptions to supplement the funds left by that worthy for charitable purposes. It would appear, however, that the primary object was not a bond of union; for each political party dines reparatedly, while a third feast is provided for a body which calls itself neutral and owns at all talk of public affairs. Although brought about by different roads, the result is, it is believed, satisfactory—a liberal contribution being into the coffers of the charities; and perhaps a slight stimulus is given to the understanding by the spice of antagonism which the three separate meetings indicate as existing. This year both the Liberal and the Conservative parties were animated by such a novelty as the appearance of new M.P.s for the borough of Bristol and the second division of the county of Somerset ould afford. In the borough, though Mr. Henry Berkley retains his nearly thirty years' tenure of the representation, and was present to vindicate his claims thereto; a new member was paraded in the person of Sir Morton Peto, who, as he was expected to give him an egression, after the manner of the Romans, on account of some distinguishing quality or performance, was described as the "employer of 10,000 men." Having, doubtless for good reasons—perhaps on account of the last that was urged—those blank words within an omnibus ride of its member—quitted Finsbury, Sir Morton suddenly plunged deep into the good graces of the Bristolians (Mr. Berkeley says it was his impression; but did he not harness) ; and, making a good fight against a Conservative, was triumphantly returned at the last election. Mr. Berkeley, M.P., has had to act on behalf of Colston with the Liberals was Colonel Kingscote, who, being a Gloucestershire magnate and member of the county family of that county, is acceptable at Bristol.

There was a tremendous expression of faith at this banquet. Mr. Berkeley, probably thinking that his constituents would like to see something of the way in which he conducts those high negotiations which are as regular annuals in the House as Colston's feasts are at Bristol, went in for exactly the same sort of thing. Those who are familiar with the pearly duologue which is the usual business of a member, great or small, in the house, will easily realise the kind of thing which he delivered at Bristol. For Mr. Berkeley, the words of Miss Biddy Fudge, inserted "hyanas in low;" and anyone may be allowed to imagine an heralder giving the cue to the cheers, laughter, jokes and illustrations, strung together on the slenderest thread of argument. If the kind of thing of which Mr. Berkeley's ballot-speech in the house consist be endurable—firstly, because it is odd; and secondly, because, however our legislators may talk, they are supposed to be evidently in earnest on a political question of abstract importance—it is probable that few persons will seethe point of making a long drawn-out speech on a newspaper upon the same topic. It is, however, one way of paying a tribute to Lord Palmerston; but it was a roundabout, not to say a clumsy, way of doing it. Mr. Berkeley, after showing himself in a similitude of his principal part as a member of Parliament to a fresh, and therefore, as he thought, a more highly appreciative audience, may have been too much for him; but it may be suggested to Mr. Berkeley that whatever may be his constituents, who will only make reappearance next Session, there will be at least 350 or 370 new members in the house who will be anxious to see in a great extent a fresh field and pasture new wherein to disport himself in his peculiar fashion in the coming year.

But, whatever may have been Mr. Berkeley's pretensions on this occasion, they paled before the portentous enunciation of Sir Morton Peto. Having just returned from a long visit to America, he seemed to think it incumbent upon him to speak his matures and experiences at once. He was not going to write volumes of other travellers. He spoke on public affairs with an authority which might cause mere members of parliament to think that one man's apparent power in the state, and to wonder if we were approaching that point in political evolution when a species of dictatorship is inevitable, at least for a time. The hon. gentleman was very tolerant of the Lord Lieuten, and for the moment he thought that if it had not been for measures which that noble Lord had been mainly instrumental in carrying, Sir Morton Peto could not at that moment have been a member of Parliament. It is to be hoped that there may be some people who do not see any special ground for gratitude to Lord Russell in that connection. But, then, the member for Bristol was good enough to say that he was willing to give time—two, or three years, he presumed—to see what the Reform in Parliament; and indicated a readiness to permit an inquiry into the state of the suffrage and the condition of the people under that privilege; so that Lord Elcho may count with some reason on getting the Commission on those points which he has put on the above early next Session. On the whole, the impression that a diligent, we will not say painful, perusal of Sir Morton Peto's speech leaves on one is, that he is ready and willing to undertake the entire management and administration of the country—by contract!

The Conservatives at the second banquet were certainly, but only with the gloss of novelty. Mr. Greville is a new member for Somersetshire, but he is not a new member of Parliament, having sat for Windsor in a former Parliament and has even been a Lord of the Treasury in a Tory Government. As a new Sir William Temple he may be supposed to have had an opportunity of studying the classics, at least so far as to be acquainted with those quotations which are dear to country gentlemen because they are enshalmed in that collection of rudiments which even they have managed to get through. It was, therefore, natural that, in reading—not hearing, therefore, it may really not be his fault—he reminded of a certain sage who "semper ante vadoque sees" are the pivot words, he will comprehend what one means. In justice, it may be said that by-the-by-reminded-of-a-certain-sage candidate very well; though Mr. Fremantle is by no means the man to be paling in his nurse's arms. As a matter of fact Sir William Temple was, in his way, a personage in the house. Mr. Greville has a tolerable gap in the Conservative ranks to fill up, and there is also a vacancy in the private business, or, rather, the chairmanship business, left by his predecessor. As to Lord Papers, we are not aware that Knatchbull in the representation of the division, and who made his first public appearance amongst his constituents on this occasion, so far as the chroniclers inform us, has succeeded to the title of the Colonel is about the extent of the change.

The leader of her Majesty's Opposition has been rather busy in Bucks, but for the nonce he appears to have laid down politics and taken up horses. In his character of a country gentleman, Mr. Disraeli appears in the body of agricultural meetings, and, professing to have some thither to learn, is a short time after found at the head of a boast leading, and practically telling the people about him that they are altogether as obtuse as usual in their knowledge and advantages of the cattle plague. He speaks with so much authority under the guise of meek suggestion that one is inclined to believe—and we believe that he is engaged—following in a manner the example of Lord Derby—in educing the dull hours which he has to spend under the cold shade of opposition by translating the Georgics of Virgil.

The Russian language is for the future to receive official sanction in Finland as well as the Finnish and Swedish tongues. The introduction of the Finnish dialect into the law courts of the duchy is comparatively recent, Swedish alone having formerly enjoyed that privilege.

It is stated that at a Cabinet Council held last Saturday it was determined to address a remonstrance to the Spanish Government against the conduct of the Admiral commanding the Spanish fleet off Valparaiso and the means taken by Spain to enforce her demands upon Chili; and a Cabinet messenger conveying the instructions to the British Minister at Madrid was dispatched on Saturday evening.

FLORENCE, THE CAPITAL OF ITALY.

THE famous and beautiful city which has been chosen for the capital of the new kingdom of Italy is situated in the central part of the Italian peninsula, where the valley of the Arno, inclosed on three sides by mountains or lofty hills of the Apennine range, opens westward into the wide plain of Tuscany, thence spreading as far as the eye can see along each bank of the river to the sea, which, in fact, is not far off in the seacoast with the port of Leghorn.

This fair plain, extending from east to west about sixty miles, and perhaps eighty or ninety miles from the mountains of Lucca and Pistoia on the north to those above Sienna which divide it from the Roman States on the south, is one of the most interesting countries in Europe by its associations with the history of the Middle Ages. From the twelfth to the sixteenth century, while other nations, which had been subdued to feudalism, were roughly welded into a harder consistency of political government, Italy was the scene of the great monarchies of the modern world—such as France and England, Spain and the Germanic Empire—were developed in their certain growing and flourished in this region of Italy enjoyed a practical independence. Some, indeed, might say, a merely nominal allegiance to the Emperor elected by the Princes of Germany and invested with a titular supremacy by the shadow of a Roman Senate. But these Imperial pretensions, whatever their force in Lombardy, or in Sicily and Naples, where the Emperor had numerous vassals and princes claiming dominion in the name of the paramount lord had frequently created the most illustrious of their names, was constantly baffled by the strength and spirit of the city republics of Tuscany; and Florence was the soul of that glorious resistance. Defeating every Imperial attempt to reduce her to a province, the nobility of artisans, weavers, dyers, and smiths; or by the policy of her statesmen, whose wealth, ingenuity, and skill in commerce made the wealthy town; keeping up, at the same time, the practices of social self-government, the municipal liberties, the local administration; and joining to herself, with an instinctive prescience of her future destinies, the cities of her own race, she became the colleagues of protection and service, by purchase or voluntary surrender, and by a forcible union, of the smaller republics of Florence became the most important of the Italian States. Florence, too, was then, as now, the richest, the most highly civilised, the most refined community in Italy. Her merchants were the genius of ancient Greece, taking, like Athens, the intellectual leadership of her town all genius and learning, and developing, in her turn, the most complete their political union—a consummation which seemed possible to the Greek City only in the fables of Plato—was in fact, and was realised in our own day. These are the historic antecedents of the queenly Tuscan City, which has been chosen, by the voice of all the other to the glories of the Italian name, as the birthplace of so many of those illustrious men—Dante, Boccaccio, Petrarch, Machiavelli, Americo Vespucci, Galileo, and others whose performances and discoveries have most contributed to the intellectual progress of modern and the fine arts, of science, philosophy, and geographical research. We can very well understand the claims of Florence to be preferred above all others as the capital of Italy. Her historic associations are such, although defaced by the corruptions and humiliations of the Papal Court, as to be the most interesting to the whole of the civilised minds. It is worthy of remark, however, that Rome, since the decline of the Papal power, has begun to rise in the estimation of temporal sovereignty and the seat of an ecclesiastical dominion ruling over the minds of Europe, has got to be, next to Florence, the most eminent Italians—poets, painters, sculptors, architects, musicians, men of science, philosophers, statesmen, lawyers, soldiers, politicians, and even theologians, who have adorned Italian nationality and recommended their native land to the grateful admiration of the world. Florence, which is the old town in the Romagna, with Modena, Umbria, and the Marches, may rank next to those of Rome and Naples in the list of the provinces of Italy; but Florence, it must be confessed that Rome stands lowest of all in the list. All these provinces, however, will be duly represented and displayed in St. Peter's and the Vatican, and in the other gorgeous churches and palaces of Rome; but the original masterpieces of genius—the genius of a Roman; whereas the people of Florence in the time of their freedom had so many natural geniuses that they displayed in besides taking the foremost place in Italian politics—besides taking a place similar to that of Athens in England in the commercial and financial affairs of the world—they do, moreover, in addition to more substantial products, rend forth a host of gifted artists, in every generation, whose productions are not only remarkable for attaining the highest merit, may be seen dispersed through all the galleries and museums of Europe.

Such are the achievements of Florence in past ages, and so well has she deserved the honour of being selected as the capital of the kingdom of Italy have now conferred upon her. This decision, though it was threatened by the expectations of the Roman party, seems to be now the fulfilment of the convention of September, 1864, with reference to the Roman question, and for some years been entertained by the Italian statesmen as the most desirable settlement for the capital of the new kingdom. It was expressly advocated in 1861, in a pamphlet by the Chevalier Nigra, the Italian Minister at the Imperial court of Piedmontese gentleman who was one of the very earliest, more than twenty years ago, to urge the claims of Florence to the high destination of Italy on the basis of constitutional freedom. In addition to the motives which may appear to recommend the Florentine territory to partake of a sentimental character, there are serious practical considerations in favour of the selection which have to be duly remembered that General Chiallini, in a debate of the Italian Parliament last year, showed that Florence was above the position in a strategical point of view, and presented a scheme for the fortification of the roads leading from the north of Italy to Florence, and for the disposition of troops so as to form a defensive line for the Piedmontese army, which would then run great risk, in marching upon the capital, if it were placed at Rome, in the heart of the Italian in Piedmont. The position of Rome, on the other hand, has been pointed out by the Italian generals as being peculiarly suited for offensive operations, for that city to be covered against an enemy advancing from the Tuscan frontier, and southward along the Apennine range. Florence, though geographically more distant from Austria and Venetia than Rome, is in fact much nearer to Rome in the true centre of population in Italy; there being about eleven millions of people to the south, and about the same number to the north of a line drawn from Florence to Ancona, the two extremities of the three millions in the Venetian provinces, not yet delivered from the Austrian yoke. The accessibility of Florence by several different lines of railroad from north, south, east, and west, and the facility of keeping up communications with the sea, by the ample arsenal of Spezzia at no great distance and Genoa on the neighbouring coast, have also been pointed out as reasons for the strategical argument, in the opinion of all foreigners who have visited Florence and know, more than any Italians, the comparative merits of the cities. The former city, though exposed to cold mountain winds in winter, and in summer subject to the heat of the sun, is, generally speaking, stimulating, as to the enjoyment of the open air, and delightful in the atmosphere of the Papal city would be likely to agree with the active and laborious habits of public business to which Cavour and Ricasoli have trained the members of the Administration and of the Legislature of the United Kingdom. Florence is situated in the midst of luxuriance and lightness of its atmosphere, as well as by the cheerful vivacity and civility of its social life, is likely to have a salutary influence upon the honourable and official gentlemen who are called to reside there in the service of their common country.

The aspect of this favoured city, when viewed from either of the neighbouring hills—which stand around it bearing their walled vineyards, their groves of silvered-green olives, and their dark avenues of cypress high above the fertile fields and fruit-gardens of the valley, and with a hundred rural villas glittering white among their sunny slopes, above which the towers and battlements of some grim old castle or convent peer down from the crest of the hill—the aspect of Florence is always delightful, whether it be from Fiesole on the north-east side, or from the View road on the south-west side. The view from the south-east, which last is the View we have chosen (from an excellent photograph by Mr. James Graham) for the large Engraving presented with this Number of our Journal.

Here, upon the terrace in front of the ancient church and monastery, where, in 1530, during the fatal siege, Michael Angelo, painter, poet, sculptor, architect, and military engineer, directing the patriotic defence of the Republican City, constructed his fortifications against the army of Charles V.—here we look down upon the most interesting part of Florence. It is the Florence of the old Free Commonwealth, the Florence of Dante, which we see before us, divided only by the Arno and by the narrow space which is left back from the hill of San Miniato where our View is taken. Those who do not know the precise situation, but have a general notion of the chief objects of interest usually sought for by visitors to Florence, should be forewarned that several of the most remarkable palaces and churches are not to be found in this View. The Duomo, with its campanile, the Baptistery, the palace and cost, to obtain a panoramic view of the whole of Florence, or even of the greater part of it, from some other eligible point. They are dispersed on both banks of the river and in different quarters of the city. We must, therefore, look out there other than either the Pitti Palace or the churches of Santo Spirito and of the Carmine, which lie out of sight to the spectator's left hand, on the south or near side of the river; nor the Church of Santa Maria Novella, too far narrowed on the opposite bank; nor the Church of Santa Croce, which is hidden behind the trees at the extreme right hand corner of the Engraving. Still further to the left, and farther off, and beyond the large extension of our View might have been desirable. A mile of the Long' Arno, to the left, with its newly-built mansions and hotels, and with two of the most conspicuous of the Ponte Santa Trinità, adorned with statues of the Seasons, and the Ponte alla Carraja—besides the impression there would rather show the visitor, where that year and the city wall terminate at the entrance to the Cascine or Public Park, must be left to the imagination of our readers, being necessarily excluded from the limits of the present Illustration. In this manner, full of Florence, and other buildings, which lie one behind another, beyond our View to the right hand, and occupied by some of the most noble edifices in the suburbs of Florence, can only be left to the memory of those who have seen them or to the hope of those who have not. With this explanation, which was requisite to prevent the reader from looking for objects that are not represented in the Engraving, we will now point out a few of the principal features which are actually given in the picture.

Beginning at the extreme right, where the Church of Santa Croce, as we said, is out of sight, we see the open space in front, across the street of the foreground and the large modern house on the opposite side of the way, which is called the piazza de Piazza Santa Croce, in front of the church, where the statue of Dante was unveiled, in the presence of Kossuth, during the recent festival and celebration of the poet's birth, on Sunday, the 14th of last May, some illustrations of which appeared in the Journal of the 24th of June. The Piazza di Santa Croce, in truth, may boast of glorious historical associations, going back to the middle of the thirteenth century, a time when Dante was born. It was there, in 1256, that the popular Assembly was held, which, by a supreme resolution of the Florentine Commonwealth, at once forced the Ghibelline nobles of political power, renounced the supremacy of the German Emperor, and established the democratical constitution which grew so quickly to be one of the most famous States of that period. The Church of Santa Croce, which was commenced in 1294, at edition of the marble façade, may be regarded as the Florentine Westminster Abbey, from the numbers of eminent men of the most distinguished men, besides Dante, who have conferred honour upon the country of their birth. There are the tombs of Michael Angelo Buonarotti, of Niccolò Machiavelli, of Galileo Galilei, and of Vittorio Alfieri, the last a Piedmontese. A familiar stanza from Childe Harold will be in the recollection to quote, expressive of feelings of reverence and the thoughtful meditations inspired by a visit to this sacred place of the dead:

> "In Santa Croce's holy precincts lie
> Ashes which make it holier dust than earth."

But if Santa Croce be the Westminster Abbey of Florence, the Duomo, or Cathedral, with the tall tower of St Mark's Campanile, will compare well always occur most naturally to the mind of an Englishman when his eye rests upon the mighty dome, towering in the city, as in London, which forms the most conspicuous object in the middle of the View. The Florentine Duomo, or Cathedral of Santa Maria del Fiore, is above St. Paul's. Its cupola, which is of an octagonal shape, and covered with red tiles, is both broader and wider than St. Paul's, though the entire height from the ground, 387 ft, including the main building, is not quite equal to the huge cathedral of London. The length of the Duomo is 500 ft.; its breadth, with the transepts, 310 ft.; the nave, which is divided into aisles over with slabs of white and black, and reddish yellow, laid with cunning alternation, is patterns designed by the first artists of Florence, and executed in a very pleasing and agreeable effect. This noble structure, built from the designs and under the superintendence of Arnolfo, Giotto, and Brunelleschi, between 1298 and 1450, is one of the most remarkable, on the taste, the wealth, and liberality of the citizens of the Florentine Republic; it may vie with the finest cathedrals whatever in Europe, and is second to Royal and Imperial endowments among other nations of Europe.

The Bell Tower, or Campanile, which we see in our Engraving, seems quite close to the end of the cathedral, though it is really a few yards distant; and it is also, as we have said, not quite so high as beautiful—if not, as Mr. Ruskin and others have pronounced it, the most beautiful bell tower in the world. It is a square tower of marbles, the varying dimensions of which are so adjusted to each other as to produce a perfect harmony of proportions. The total height is 276 ft.; the architecture is of the Gothic character of the Italian style. The same method of external decoration, by alternate pieces of differently coloured marbles, which is called in Italian a pezzi e corsi, is employed in the Campanile of Tuscany, has been applied to the Campanile, but even more richly and exquisitely than in the case of the Duomo. Indeed, the Campanile story is adorned, moreover, with an interesting series of sculptures in which the whole progress of human life, from infancy to age, which are sixteen colossal statues, four on each side.

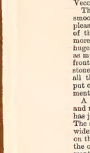
The Baptistery, which is the most ancient edifice in the Engraving is little to the left of the Campanile, and having likewise the appearance from that point of view, of attached to the cathedral, is the cathedral, stands in the Piazza del Duomo, opposite the church door on its western side. Its outside is covered, like the other buildings of Florence, with the same marbles, arranged in a less elaborate style of ornament and without their pleasing variety of colour. It is chiefly remarkable, however, for the three magnificent specimens of sculptured scenes of Bible history, done by Andrea Pisano and Ghiberti, and which may be seen in perfection from the pictures in the Renaissance Court of our Crystal Palace at Sydenham. The interior, where the Florentines have their most solemn religious festivals, is, of course, to the mind of a devout and patriotic Florentine, invested with a sacredness and sanctity which no home affections can inspire. But in a passage of his great poem, how he once got into trouble by breaking the marble lid of the font in his baptismal ceremony, the unfortunate little boy will not object, beneath the lid, through the round hole where it was dipped, as would, but for his interference, have been poured as well as baptised.

Referring once more to the Engraving, we invite the reader's notice to a large and magnificent building, appearing hardly less lofty even on its lofty summit, resting, he w perceive, not on the four walls of the tower, but on a high and massive substructure, with several projecting bolkens far outside four walls. This is the tower of the Palazzo Vecchio, or Old Palace, of Florence, the Hall of Supreme Government, Council Chamber, and House of Parliament, or Legislative Assembly, of the Florentine Republic of Dante. After the elective magistracy of the Commonwealth, the Anziani, or Priori, chosen by household suffrage in the several wards, and their president, the Gonfaloniere or standard-bearer, with the captain of the civic militia, vast constantly to reside during the two months of their official term, being forbidden to leave the stern abode of State for any private business or pleasure. No building, not even the Capitol at Rome, has been the witness of a more adventurous history than this grim old pile, which now receives the assembled deputies and senators of the new kingdom of Italy, opening the second Parliament of the united nation. In looking at the View carefully, we may observe the other large buildings—the Barg the church of Or San Michele, and part of the Badia di

San Firenze, coming nearly into a line with the battlemented mass of the Palazzo Vecchio. These cannot easily be distinguished without an exact knowledge of the relative positions of the different streets in which they stand. The Uffizi, which contains the most extensive and precious collections of busts, paintings, statues, and other works of art—surpassing even the renowned picture-gallery of the Pitti Palace—is a long range of building, from the angle of the Piazza della Signoria, where it abuts on the Palazzo Vecchio, extending towards the river, as shown in our View.

The new bridge represented in the Engraving are, first, the Ponte alle Grazie, or Ponte Rubaconte as it is sometimes called, which is seen in the middle, having a large arch, and supported on each pier; and, secondly, the Ponte Vecchio, "the Old Bridge," half a mile lower down the stream. This bridge is also supported on arches, on each side the roadway, with shops mostly occupied by jewellers or goldsmiths, who have also their habitations in the upper floors or rooms, on the same premises. But the River Arno, which shrinks in the summer to only a trace and shallow stream, comes down occasionally in the winter to only a tremendous flood, as our readers will probably remember from the spirited sketch, by Mr. T. L. Rowbotham, we engraved for our publication of Jan. 4, 1864; and it may be conjectured that at such seasons the rickety old houses of the Ponte Vecchio are not a safe or desirable residence.

The streets of Florence are generally narrow, but very clean, and smoothly paved with flat flagstones, which make them quite safe under pleasant walking, but are not so good for horses and carriages. Most of the principal streets have no foot-pavement whatever. The more ancient parts of the town the streets are rather gloomy; the large mansions of the Florentine nobility and wealthy merchants present as much with a view to defensive strength as to showing an agreeable front. Many of the houses are built in a plain and substantial manner, with iron gratings in every window, the upper stories display all the grace of Italian domestic architecture. The Florence Club all the grace of Italian domestic architecture. The Florence Club got on the top of Newgate would give a notion of the effect. The basement of the Pitti Palace is a stupendous example of this kind.



A curious sight is the demolishing of one of the old city walls, and making a delightful promenade, or boulevard, all round Florence, has just been arranged by the municipal authorities of the municipality. The street leading to the King's residence, the Pitti Palace, has been widened. The projected extension of the city walls includes Bellosguardo, on the road to Fiesole, and as far as the Villa Poggio Imperiale, on the opposite side, will soon provide the same accommodation to much wanted in the metropolis of a great country.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS.

LORD FREDERICK BRACKLEK.

Lord Frederick Charles Prior Beauclerk, of Little Grimsby Hall, in the county of Lincoln, Captain in the Royal Navy, who died on Thursday, the 16th ult., at Ingoldmells, in that county, was the second son of William, eighth Duke of St. Albans, by his second wife, Georgiana, daughter of Admiral Sir Richard Keats, of Little Grimsby Hall. He was born June 28, 1803, and was for only two years in the Royal Navy when, on attaining his age of 21, he married, Feb. 16, 1825, Jemima, sixth daughter of James Raymond Johnstone, Esq., of Alva, Clackmannanshire, by whom he leaves four sons, William Nedthorpe and Frederick Amelius.

SIR RICHARD BROOKE, BART.

Sir Richard Brooke, sixth Baronet, of Norton Priory, in the county of Chester, who died, on the 11th inst., at his seat, Norton Priory, near Preston-Brook, was eldest son of Sir Richard Brooke, the fifth Baronet, by his wife, Mary, second daughter of Sir Robert Cunliffe, second Baronet, of Acton Park. He was born Aug. 19, 1805, and was educated at Eton College. He was a magistrate and deputy Lieutenant for the county of Chester, and was a High Sheriff thereof in 1835. He succeeded to the baronetcy more than seventy years. He married, Dec. 8, 1831, his first cousin Harriet, second daughter of Sir Foster Cunliffe, third Baronet, of Acton Park; and by her (who died in 1870) had five sons, three of whom survive him, and five female children, all of whom have married—viz., Mary, wife of Rowland Eyles-Stephens Warrington, Esq., of Aston, Cheshire; Harriet, wife of William, eleventh Viscount Strangford; Emily, wife of the Rev. Richard Bourke Williamson, and mother of Edward, second son of Lord Skelmorlie; Caroline Frances, wife of the Hon. Arthur Lascelles, fifth son of Henry, second Earl of Harewood; and Sophia, wife of Sir Frederick Hervey Bathurst, Baronet. Sir Richard Brooke is succeeded by his eldest son, now Sir Richard Brooke, seventh Baronet, who was born Dec. 13, 1834, and was formerly a Lieutenant in the 1st Life Guards. He married, Dec. 12, 1848, Lady Lucinda Catherine Lambton, eldest daughter of General the Hon. Sir Alexander Duff, G.C.B., and sister of James, present Earl Fife, K.T., and by her (who died Dec. 25, 1864) has a family of six sons and three daughters. This family of Brooke is of very old standing in the county of Chester; they are a branch of the Brookes of Mere, in Cheshire, sprung immediately from Sir Richard Brooke of Norton, a Knight of St. John of Jerusalem, Sheriff of Cheshire in 1554. The present Baronet's great-grandfather was Sheriff of Cheshire during the Civil War and his grandfather was Colonel of Grey Cloaks, the first Baronet, being so created after the Restoration, in 1662. He was the direct ancestor of the Baronet just dead and of the present Baronet.

VICE-ADMIRAL AUSTIN.

Vice-Admiral Sir Horatio Thomas Austin, K.C.B., who died on the 16th inst., at his residence in Leicester-square, was the last survivor of those who, in early lifetime, entered the Royal Navy in the spring of 1815, and was a first-class volunteer and midshipman under Captain Sir Edward Brenton, and under Captain Sir Charles Ogle, with whom he witnessed the chief operations of the American War, including the capture of Washington, Baltimore, Fort Erie, New Orleans, and the bombardment of Stonington. He subsequently acted on the African coast and in the Mediterranean and South American stations. He shared in Captain Parry's second Polar expedition, sailing as First Lieutenant in the Hecla, and commanded the Griper in the last and most important part in the operations on the coast of Syria, and was present at the capture of Acre. He was Captain of the Excellent in 1854, and assisted in the first great trials then made in forcing the popular opinion to accept the fact that the body of 1850 Egyptians were driven from a stronghold and were compelled to surrender. He was also at the capture of Bomarsund. For his services in the war on the coast of Syria he was made a C.B. He held various commands up till 1858, when he was appointed Admiral-Superintendent of Malta Dockyard, from which he retained up to November last year. He was made a Rear-Admiral in 1857, and also in Vice-Admiral. He was a Knight of the Order of the Bath, last. The gallant Admiral had been more than fifty years in the Navy, forty of which he spent in hard, active service.

LIEUTENANT-COLONEL W. B. RAMSAY.

Lieutenant-Colonel William Burnett Ramsay, who died at his seat, Banbury Lodge, Aberdeenshire, on the 10th inst., was the eldest son of Captain Thomas Ramsay, 67th Regiment, by his first wife, Jane, second daughter of Mr. Alexander Burnett, of Kemnay, in the county of Aberdeen, and was born in Edinburgh. He was but a few months old when his father died, early age, and, after some hard service, retired about twelve years ago, with the rank of Captain in her Majesty's Indian Army, and settled in the estate of Banbury Lodge on the demise of his late uncle, Lieutenant-General William Burnett, Deputy-Lieutenant for George-hill, county of Aberdeen, and Colonel of Cruttes. Captain Ramsay was afterwards appointed Lieutenant-Colonel of the Forfar and Kincardine Militia, which command he resigned when Cardross raised that regiment to a very high state of efficiency. His ill-health, however, compelled him to resign that command also, and he devoted with a great measure to the duties of a country gentleman. He was for some years a magistrate for the county of Aberdeen, and took a warm interest in the foreign high rent in that county. He was also a Deputy-Lieutenant. He was a strong regular discharge of duty in that modest position set an example which had a salutary effect on the people. He was a staunch and zealous advocate of various philanthropic and religious movements.

WILLS AND BEQUESTS.

The will of Lady Tyrwhitt, relict of Sir Thomas John Tyrwhitt-Jones, Bart., of Stanley Park, Shropshire, and Stanton Harcourt, Oxfordshire, who died at Bayswell in London, on the 23rd ult., by the executors and trustees—namely, Thomas Tyrwhitt-Jones, Esq., Prior-park, Somersetshire; Colonel Charles Tyrwhitt, Aide-de-Camp to Field Marshal his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge. The personalty was sworn under £30,000. The testatrix, Elizabeth Wallaston, Lady Tyrwhitt, was the daughter of John Macnamara, Esq., of St. Kilda. Her husband, the late Sir Thomas, who died in 1859, had assumed the additional name of Jones, which was discontinued by his son, the present Baronet. Her Ladyship died on the 24th of June last, having executed her will on May 23, 1851, and added two codicils, 1861 and 1864. Her Ladyship has bequeathed to her son, Sir Richard Thomas Tyrwhitt, Bart., the sum of £1000, which was presented to her late husband by the Corporation of Shrewsbury, and also the gold medal and bequeaths to him all the very ornaments and trust, &c., brought from China; to her daughters and granddaughters various specific relics, also rings and other articles of jewellery, as well as pecuniary legacies to them and to her sons; and to her sister, Caroline Macnamara, an annuity of £100. Her son Colonel Tyrwhitt is appointed residuary legatee.

The will of the Hon. Dr. C. Hamilton, D.C.L., late M.P., formerly Chief Justice of Nova Scotia, has been proved in London. The personalty was sworn under £6000. The will is concise, and in his own handwriting, dated 1863. The testator died in August last, aged sixty-eight. He was an Admiralty by birth, and the son of the Hon. Mr. Justice W. Hamilton, of Nova Scotia. This learned Judge and popular writer was twice married—first, in 1824, to Louisa, daughter of Captain L. Newman, R.N., by whom he had seven, in 1836, to Sarah Harriet, daughter of W. Mortyn Owen, Esq. He has bequeathed the whole of his property, both real and personal, to his wife, whom he has appointed sole executrix. (For obituary and portrait see Number for Sept. 2 and 9.)

The will of Richard Martineau, Esq., late of Walsham-le-Willows, Suffolk, who died on the 8th ult., and of Thomas Mott, of Chiswick-street, was proved in the London Court, on the 28th ult., by his son, John Martineau, Esq., and a nephew-in-law, Frederick Thomas Somerset Soddon, Esq., of Gracechurch-square, Hyde Park, the executors and trustees. The personalty was sworn under £35,000. The testator, who was a Deputy-Lieutenant for the county and Bank of England, and a Director of the London, and Royal Free Hospital; and a like legacy of £500 to the British and Foreign Bible Society. The late Lord Chancellor Westbury, Baronet, of Bromham, has bequeathed to the Birmingham General Hospital, the Queen's Hospital (Birmingham), and the Birmingham and Midland Institute a legacy of £1000. And the late James Crossley, Esq., of Arrerer-cross, Hampstead, has bequeathed to the Literary Fund Society a legacy of £1000.

SPAIN AND CHILI.

DISAPPROBATION of profligacy in a youth is usually tempered with pity for his inexperience. There are few things, however, that provoke such unmitigated censure as repeated relapses on the part of an elderly man, whenever means and opportunity fall within his reach, into the vices of his earlier days. Spain seems intent on exhibiting this weakness on a national scale. In the palmy age of her ascendancy she was wont to indulge without scruple her domineering temper, and to feed her greatness upon what she extorted from others far more than upon the rewards of her legitimate enterprise or upon what she made her own by the exercise of her industry. Her prosperity, like a gorgeous dream, passed away, and for several generations she has been condemned to eat the bitter fruit of her own unrighteous policy. Latterly, a few years of domestic tranquillity have enabled her to share to some extent the material benefits resulting from the vast expansion of commerce outside her own limits. She might easily have profited by it much more largely than she has done. But the slight revival with which she has been favoured has but resuscitated the tendencies which more than a century and a half of pitiable humiliation has failed to extinguish; and no sooner had she recovered consciousness of growing strength than she looked about her for occasions to exert it at the expense of weaker neighbours. Her invasion of Morocco, her intrusion in relation to Mexico, her reassumption of sovereignty in St. Domingo, her snatch at Peru, and now, again, her preposterous behaviour towards Chili, justify the world's suspicion that Spain has not even yet learned the lesson which her own experience should have learned for her conscience—that the lasting pre-eminence of a people can only be built upon the foundation of virtuous character.

Notwithstanding the tidings which have transpired within the last few days, and to which we shall presently revert, we fear the outrageous injustice of Admiral Pareja towards the Chilian Republic was premeditated by the higher authorities at home. It is certain that the Spanish Government based their complaint against Chili upon grounds of offence which it would be mild to call puerile. It is certain that they recalled Senor Tavira, their ordinary Minister, for having accepted (although he was known to be in receipt) the explanations of the Government charged with misconduct. It is all but certain that Admiral Pareja's known vindictive feelings towards the Chilians, in whose war of independence his father lost his life, were the principal reason of his appointment as Plenipotentiary in the room of Tavira, and that he was counted on as a man that might be trusted to enforce a silly claim in the most offensive manner. The enterprise, therefore, such as it was, must be sanctified, in all its main features at least, to the O'Donnell Cabinet, who first found occasion for a quarrel with Chili, and who gave Admiral Pareja ample means of pushing it to extremities. If the latter has overstepped the bounds of international comity in his management of the affair, there is no good reason to suppose that the atrocious violence of his insolent and overbearing demeanour, much rather than the character of his acts, are displeasing to his superiors, and that if no remonstrance had been reached them from influential quarters no check would have been placed upon the Admiral's violence. In fact, we are informed on what appears to be incontestable authority that the Spanish Minister of Foreign Affairs, in a circular note to the representatives of Spain at foreign Courts, has formally expressed approval of Admiral Pareja's conduct, as well as the determination of the Government at Madrid not to permit the dignity of Spain to be outraged without exacting satisfaction.

What, then, are the original offences charged against the Republic of Chili, and in what way has the dignity of the Spanish nation been affronted? It is necessary to take this into consideration, for everybody who has read the falsehood the world and the world understands how easy it is for a strong state to make unreasonable demands upon the weak, and to resent non-compliance with them as an unpardonable violation of relative obligations. Spain had specified through Senor Tavira four grounds of dissatisfaction with Chili. She had lost national honour had been disparaged by some street brawlers in front of the Spanish Minister's house at Santiago; for which, however, that same Minister had acknowledged that due reparation had been made. Secondly, that some Chilian journalists had sharply commented on the conduct of Spain towards Peru, and was, nevertheless, permitted by the Government of the Republic to go unpunished; to which complaint the answer was that, inasmuch as the press of Chili is free, there is no place for the infraction of which the journalist could be arraigned. Thirdly, it was alleged that Chili had violated her neutrality by permitting a Peruvian ship of war to refit in one of her ports; which, as has been observed before any declaration of war by Spain against Peru, is no offence whatever against international law, as interpreted by other European Powers. Lastly, it was charged against the Republic as unfriendly act that she had declared postal cards to be contraband of war during the contest between her neighbour and Spain; which, as an independent State, she was not bound to do. For these offences Admiral Pareja was dispatched as an armed Plenipotentiary to extort from the Government of Chili the most ample redress, and, unquestionably, he proceeded to execute his task in a spirit thoroughly in unison with that which dictated the indictment.

The Spanish Admiral so timed his movements that he was able to cast anchor off Valparaiso on the afternoon of the day immediately preceding the fiftieth anniversary of the independence of Chili from the mother country, for the celebration of which unusual preparations had been made. On the very day his demands were made known to the Chilian Government. They were called upon, as a preliminary token of salutation, instantly to strike the Spanish flag with twenty-one guns, after having done which, they were informed, he would deign to state what satisfaction his Government would accept. He gave them four days for consideration, threatening to proceed to extremities if after that interval they refused compliance with his terms. The whole people of Chili felt the sting of the insult. The Government replied to him in a dignified and argumentative despatch to the effect that the Republic would not accede to his demands. The Diplomatic Corps protested, but in vain. Pareja announced a blockade of the Chilian ports; and Congress, in both Houses, instantly and unanimously replied by a declaration of war and by authorising the issue of twenty millions of dollars for carrying it on. The paralysis of trade was severe, but temporary. Commerce, refused all outlet by the Chilian seaboard, was relieved as soon as possible by provision for the establishment of land communications; and letters of marque were issued for the purpose of harassing the shipping of the enemy. Such was the state of affairs when the last mail that has arrived left Valparaiso.

It was handily to be expected, considering the immense amount of trade transacted between Chili and this country, and the extent of British capital placed in peril by these events, that her Majesty's Government should remain silent in view of so wanton a display of violence towards an inoffensive State. They therefore instructed Sir John Crampton, our Ambassador to the Court of Madrid, to present an energetic remonstrance against Admiral Pareja's acts, which step, we are happy to add, was followed by satisfactory results. The O'Donnell Administration, made conscious, it may be supposed, by the outcry which the Admiral's proceedings had raised in Europe of the gigantic blunder which had been perpetrated, met the representations of Sir John Crampton with studied politeness, admitted that the conduct of their Plenipotentiary was indefensible, and, if the Madrid correspondent of the Times has the correct idea, will soon redress the differences between Spain and Chili to the arbitration of the Western Powers.

Regarding the matter, then, as virtually settled, and hoping that between the present time and that of the communication of fresh instructions to Admiral Pareja no irreparable damage will be done, one cannot but speculate as to the precise objects contemplated by the Government at Madrid by this most ill-advised and reckless expedition. Spain can hardly dream of recovering her lost dominions on the Pacific Western Continent. Her recent experience at St. Domingo cannot have failed to convince her of the folly of cherishing such an ambitious hope. Her finances, however, are in a dangerously embarrassed state. Can she have meditated extortion? Her people are discontented, not to say disaffected. Did she seek to divert their attention from domestic misfortunes by means of the thirst for revenge which nations such a suit of secrecy, and the course she has pursued has been such an flagrant opposition to the most obvious principles of international morality, that it is impossible to get rid of the suspicion that her Chilian expedition was undertaken in accordance with the design of staving off some desperate emergency, the imminence of which was clearer to her statesmen than the means of averting it. If so, the plan has failed, and by its failure will probably have added to the embarrassments which envelop the mystery. We can only wait and watch with intense curiosity.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

PARIS, Thursday, Nov. 30.

THE past week has been, with us, extremely barren of incident. The Rente for January has published a most satisfactory report of the Receiver-General, in accordance with the recent suppression of M. Fould's stamp which entirely reforms a finger inimical saving than the vaunted reduction of the French army, which was trumpeted forth as such a grand boon to the working classes.

At Compiègne there has been a renewal of much the same description of song and dance as I have already chronicled, varied, however, by the performance, a few days since, at the palace theatre, of the Duke de Morny's version of the Commentaries of Cæsar.' This burlesque, for such, it appears to be, has no plot at all to depend on. A provincial, M. Pindhomme, arrives in Paris with the intention of witnessing a tragic theatre at Champ de Mars, which said review being countermanded, he is treated in place of it to a ballet of acted satire on modern society, in seven days. The Hôtel des Ventes—the general auction-rooms of Paris—figures in the piece as the "Senate." Senator Rubicon, Rector in disguise of the object to the Patent: while, on the other hand, the Diet of Izeia has voted an address of thanks to the Emperor for the Patent.

In the provincial Diets of Linz, Gratz, Salzburg, Klagenfurt, and Bregenz, which were opened on Thursday week, protests were presented against the September Patent identical with that sent to the Diet of Lower Austria.

On the other hand, at Prague, Brünn, Olmütsch, Lemberg, and Czernowitz, motions were made to present an address to the Emperor thanking his Majesty for the September Patent.

SWEDEN.

The Minister of Justice received on Tuesday a deputation of delegates from all parts of Sweden advocating the necessity of Constitutional reform. The Minister, in his reply, stated that he thought that the still prevailing resistance to a reform of the Constitution would cease after the subject had been thoroughly discussed. On the following day the deputation was received by the King. The Government is drawing up a modification of the proposed reforms.

The excitement caused by the discussions regarding the proposed reform appears to have given rise to apprehensions of disturbances at Stockholm, and 4000 troops have been assembled in that city for the purpose of preserving order.

M. Lindbick, the clergyman charged with having poisoned five persons, has committed suicide, by hanging himself in prison.

RUSSIA.

The Emperor has confirmed the modified statutes of the Bourse Reform de Russie, and has received the Council of Ministers to celebrate the decree sanctioning its organisation. The object of the modifications of the former statutes of this establishment is to place the control of the Anglo-Russian company, the shares of which will be issued at 125 silver roubles (£20). The shares are to be payable in specie. The head of business will be removed from London to Berlin, a foreign director, invested with full powers, will have a seat in the board at St. Petersburg.

Fresh intelligence has been received respecting the combined Russo-Polish conspiracy in Siberia. The Times correspondent at St. Petersburg says that, while a portion of the Poles had no more ambition object in view than to effect their escape via Japan and America, and to set during an insurrectionary movement in the very heart of Siberia. For this purpose they established in correspondence with the exiles, and to this purpose they established a close which, while it is the instrument of absolution, has, by the law of extremes, ever been more accessible to releases of a criminal and humanitarian character than to the purposes of Russian society. The civil service routine, it seems, so affects in every number as to be the most powerful opponent of innovation, and in revolutionary plots; while easiness and lightness, seduced by extravagant ideas and enabled away by false notions of liberty and confusion, are now and then lured into treason and consequent misery. In the present instance the youthful spirit of the Polish conspirators has ours have been gained over. A revolutionary proclamation found on the person of one of the conspirators had the following for its title. The measures taken by the authorities were terribly prompt and energetic.

GREECE.

"Uneasy lies the head that wears a crown." King George finds it difficult to get a Ministry. M. Bulgaris having declined to try his hand again at the task, Colonel A. M. Domonos, Minister of War from his Majesty, endeavoured to find Ministers, in vain, it seems, for a telegram informs us that M. Deligeorgio had formed a Cabinet, himself taking the portfolio of Foreign Affairs. The remaining members of the Cabinet are as follow:—M. Grivas, Minister for War; M. Mavromichalis, Home Affairs; M. Andreadis, Finance; M. Rhallis, Justice; M. Zamia, Minister for Interior; M. Spilios Autoupolis, Public Worship. Telegraphic advices speak progress in Epirus. A few days since intelligence between Tsobes and Chakis was stopped, and two of the passengers murdered, the rest were carried off, for whose ransom the Greek brigands delight in speaking of kratos sterlinon. A party of seventeen persons marched through Vonitza, and, after a short accommodation, though Lingos, the leader, was recognised by several of the inhabitants.

TURKEY.

The conversion of the internal debt of the empire will be prolonged until the 31st December.

The insurgents in the Kosan Dagh had offered their submission.

UNITED STATES.

Perhaps the news of most interest from New York is that relating to the attitude of the Government towards Mexico, in connection with which a General debate is receiving considerable attention. It has visited the Union League Club in New York, when, in reply to a speech of Mr. Dickenson expressing sympathy for Mexico and a wish for belief in her coming deliverance, the General said that the speaker's remarks concerning the future of Mexico expressed his own sentiments. The President, on the 14th ult., appointed General John A. Logan Minister, and Wm. A. Bowering, Esq., Secretary of Legation, to the "Republic of Mexico." Colonel Browning has been the private secretary of President Johnson, and is now succeeded by Colonel Robert Johnson, a son of the President, in that office. It is authoritatively announced that the Federal Government, in order to preserve neutrality in the Mexican war, will allow no Mexican vessels to enter the Federal frontier, nor permit munitions of war to be sent to either belligerent.

The South Carolina Legislature has adopted the Constitutional amendment abolishing slavery, thus removing the only obstacle on the necessary number of States to make the amendment form part of the Federal Constitution.

Mr. Worth, the popular candidate, has been elected Governor of North Carolina by a large majority.

The Fenians have raised a large house in Union-square, New York, which has been fitted up for Government offices.

The States of Wisconsin and Minnesota have voted against negro suffrage.

The ruler of Government property in Louisiana has been suspended, and, according to a New Orleans journal, some troops had been ordered to the Rio Grande.

General Kilpatrick has been appointed Minister to Chili. Before going to his post he will visit Spain on the same mission.

The general Conference of the Mormon community commenced in Great Salt Lake City on the 6th of October, and continued for six days. The meetings were larger than have been seen for years.

MEXICO.

The Republicans are not quite crushed in Mexico. On the contrary, they are actively presenting the siege of Matamoros and are marching on Baghdad.

CANADA.

Two battalions of volunteers have been ordered to be ready for frontier duty against the Fenians. The 60th Regiment has been ordered from Montreal to Western Canada. Those precautionary measures, it is stated, have considerably alarmed Mr. Darcy M'Gee has denounced the Fenians as thieves and plunderers.

INDIA.

The treaty of peace with Bhootan was signed on the 11th ult. Full apology is made to the British Government, and all the dooars are ceded. The same dooars are also given up to the British as neutralised between British India and Bhootan.

In the "isle of Sapphire," which has caused so much sensation, the Delhi Gazette gives some particulars. The buyer is a chief, who holds a post in the State of Bhopal, in Central India, is married, and who is named Khamaldeen or Kunaldeen. His age is said to be seventy-five. He is described as "a fine, handsome, and venerable looking" and for 3000 rupees the gi-l was secured for the old chief's harem. A clergyman, the Chaplain of Bojkote, took the matter in hand between the unnatural parents and her British purchaser by calling upon the political agent of Kattywar to exert his authority and rescue the child, but it is said the agent's action in the matter merely took the form of securing to the girl a handsome settlement. She was then solemnly made to "abjure the errors of the Christian Church," and formally received into communion with "the followers of the true prophet." The next step taken in regard to the child was to marry her after the Mohammedan fashion to her purchaser. By the marriage settlement the new light of the harem came in the possession of an income of 2000 rupees (£200) per annum, including an item of thirty rupees for pan and souparee, which may be looked upon as an equivalent for pin money. In the event of her being at any time banished from that blessed abode of virtue, the harem, she is to receive, for life, 2000 rupees per annum.

CHINA.

It is now asserted that Burgevine was murdered by the mandarins, and not drowned, as stated in a recent official report.

The coast of Amoy is blockaded.

The not of the telegram carrying the above news we present to our readers as a riddle, which their ingenuity may possibly solve. It runs thus:—"Question United States treaty has taken Pashley worse."

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

On Thursday, St. Andrew's day, General Sabine, as president, delivered his anniversary address to the Royal Society, and gave away the Copley medal, which was awarded this year to Dr. Joule.

The prizes awarded by the Science and Art Department to the most successful students of the St. Martin's School of Art were distributed on Wednesday by Sir Richard Mountenay, M.P.

Last Saturday fifty of the female nurses who have been for years engaged at Greenwich Hospital had the departure, having been discharged, by order of the Lords of the Admiralty, upon pensions varying according to length of service.

Two children, who, with their mother, have been chargeable to the Governor of Bethlehem Hospital, have been left by the will of a uncle of the children his left the money to them by will. Their father was a an captain and part owner of a vessel, but when he died, his wife, their mother, were left in straitened circumstances.

At the meeting of the Metropolitan Board of Works yesterday week a report was adopted which detailed the constitution and mode of payment of the Fire Brigade. Attention was drawn to the necessity for the proposal of Sir George Grey as to the consolidation of the various and now conflicting jurisdictions of the City authorities, which consolidation was not desirable.

In accordance with the gracious permission of her Majesty the new wing of the Hospital for Diseases of the Chest, Victoria Park, is to bear the name of the Alexandra Wing, in honour of the lady who, as princess was erected, and will be designated "The Albert Wing." The committee have determined that the new wing shall contain 40 beds, and the re-construction of patients, in that 120 beds will now be available for the numerous sufferers who continually apply for admission.

On Thursday, at Willis's Rooms, a testimonial was presented to Mr. Hall, the Chief Constable of the City, for his services in the detection service and a silver, the latter having belonged to William Makepeace Thackeray. The silver was presented in a speech by Mr. Lusk, and was presented in a very heartfelt manner by Mr. Leicester Buckingham, in lieu of Sir Tom Bowyer, who was unavoidably absent, being at the time in a domestic affliction. Mr. Buckingham sketched Mr. Armor's public career, in connection with the Fenian Conspiracy, Garibaldi's visit, and in the energetic recovery of the Dramatic College. Many theatrical and literary celebrities were present.

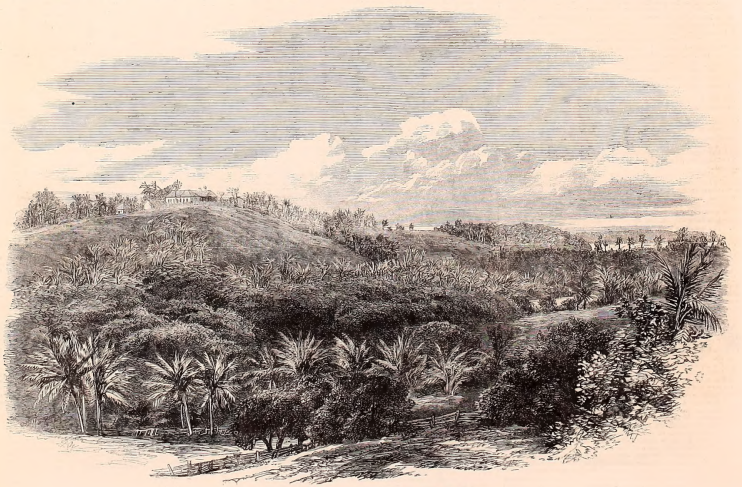
Amongst the numerous fires that have recently occurred in London few can especially worthy of mention as to the destruction and importance of the Royal Society's Fire Escape Brigade. The first is that of the fire on the premises of Messrs. Hall and Co., metal merchants, High-street, Whitechapel, at five o'clock on the morning of Nov. 24, at which Messrs. Tilley, superintendent, and Hawkins, fireman, of the Royal Society's Brigade, first perceived fire in second-floor and attic of the premises, and, on forcing open the door, found the whole of the top of the house, which at the time were raging in the most furious manner. The next fire of importance occurred between one and two on Tuesday morning, at the Nag's Head public-house, in Mayor Fire Escape Station, Superintendent Tilley, in the confusion from Baston gueses station reaching the fire with his escape, he found the lower part of the premises, which was a large public-house, in the first and second floors. The landlord (Mr. Woodward), with his wife, two children, and servant, had escaped by the back staircase, and were subsequently taken down by means of the escape, carrying each down from a height of about 30ft. The damage done by this fire is estimated at £1000.

At the meeting of the Royal Geographical Society, on Monday night, Captain Speke read a paper on the results of his African expedition, on the success of which the society had a deep and heartfelt interest. Upon the subject of the source of the Nile, Captain Speke explored the interior of Africa, from Zanzibar, where he intended to go up one of the rivers. He fitted out his expedition, and left Zanzibar in June, 1860. He would be remembered, on the first to settle the point of the existence of a large ocean mountain in the interior of Africa, which was known to the Arab slave dealers as Jagara. Captain Speke had heard of, was nearly died himself. He was received by the sale of his book to fit out a vote vessel suited for his purpose, and he left Aden in May, 1860, and arrived at Zanzibar in the June of that year, since he was gentleman and plenty of other curiosities to the British Museum. He was accompanied by Captain Grant, and proceeded among the natives, and as they considered that he and his party had brought the disease with them, they would not allow him to go. He had, however, overcome great difficulties, but he (the speaker) was not yet well informed as to their nature. He had also visited the kingdom of Uganda, and the King of Uganda had given Captain Speke a letter to his brother, who had been in Egypt, and which Captain Speke had delivered to the proper authorities and observations.

The Conservative Land Society held its annual meeting on Tuesday, in Exeter Hall, Lord Lovaine in the chair. It appeared that the cash receipts for the year ending Sept. 30 were £89,260 5s. 1d., and the grand total to the same date £1,000,000 5s. 1d. The number of shares in Richmeton was 443, 8s. 1d., and the number of members 6000. The society had purchased 1000 acres of land, and new properties allotted this year, and the capital stock was £1,000,000. The value of the land was stated to £12,000, and every payment on shares will realise 6 per cent per annum to the holder. The report was adopted. Mr. Beckett, M.P., was voted to the board; the committee elected Mr. James Goodson, M.P., chairman of the Great Eastern Railway; Mr. Hall, Mr. Hutchinson, Mr. Hall, Mr. Hutchinson, St. Austell, East Cornwall; New Ferry (opposite Liverpool), North Cheshire; Putney, Mr. Hall, Mr. Hutchinson, Mr. Hall, Mr. Hutchinson, Mr. Hutchinson, South Staffordshire; and Hereford (near the Worcester station), Hereford-shire. The meeting then broke up, and the members of the board attended to fraternity year with every indication of continuous success, having acquired a fully stable position in the commercial world. The number of shares is 443, and issued 25,000 shares, representing £1,000,000.

At the meeting of the City Commissioners of Sewers, on Tuesday, Dr. Letheby, the medical officer of health, reported that the number of deaths registered in the City during the week ending the 18th inst. of it was in a diseased condition, and 1070 in were from animals that had died of various diseases. Mr. Lott, the inspector of nuisances, had been attending points of feeding the carcases of animals that had died of disease, and the flesh was exposed for sale in human food. He stated that had such diseased meat been sold in the City it would have been condemned in the City markets, and most of it was from animals affected with the cattle plague. The Commissioners resolved to call the attention to the improper sale of such meat as human food, but extends to the danger of propagating the disease by interfering with the cattle plague. Mr. Lott was also into contact, and as it often comes from a considerable distance the risk of contagion is greatly increased. Resolutions to the same effect as those just passed were sent from Scotland last week, sort of these cigars carcases, or parts of carcases, are sent to London from Scotland, and sometimes from different countries. Mr. Lott, in reply to a question, said that the inspectors of fine was communicated to the Lord Mayor, the inspectors ascertained that a large number of animals had died of the cattle plague. Mr. Alderman Lusk and Dr. Letheby observed that the matter should be further investigated, with a view to legislation.

Lord Lyttleton was in the chair, on Tuesday night, at the annual meeting of the Society for the Protection of Birds, held in Exeter Hall. Mr. Thomas Bigelow, M.V., Mr. Ayrton, M.P., and several clergymen were also present. Lord Lyttleton congratulated the meeting thought it might say that the work of the association was nearly accomplished, and their next step would be to get a bill for the protection of the immediately before the young men were used. With respect to the evils of late payment of wages, he stated he had seen an interesting correspondence in the Glasgow, where Shaftesbury is a poor woman, who told his Lordship that the payment would be one day in the week, and that the employers generally adopted the same system. The attempt to stop Sunday trading was progressing, but it was not progressing fast enough. Mr. Ayrton, M.P., moved a resolution to the effect that the Society had heard with pleasure the proposal to close public-houses on Sunday, and that the Government should be requested to bring in a bill to that effect. Mr. Bigelow seconded the resolution, which was carried unanimously. Mr. Ayrton, M.P., then



THE OUTBREAK IN JAMAICA.

THE GOVERNOR'S HOUSE, SPANISH TOWN.

OUR Paper for last week contained an extensive View of part of the coast of Jamaica, at the eastern extremity of the island, in the neighbourhood of Morant Bay, with a nearer view of the small town of Port Morant and the ruined courthouse which was the scene of the late massacre perpetrated by the insurgent negroes, as well as views of the Hordley estate, one of the plantations attacked and ravaged by them, besides Port Royal and Kingston, the chief place of trade in the island.

As the interest excited by the recent news from Jamaica has not yet subsided, we give also in the present Number two or three Illustrations of places which are more or less associated with those deplorable events. One of them, from a sketch by Mr. C. Royle, represents the plain but commodious mansion which is the residence of the Governor at Spanish Town. That town, the official capital of the island, is nevertheless very inferior, both in size and population, to Kingston, the commercial metropolis, already mentioned, from which it is distant, by railway, about ten miles. The proceedings of the Executive Government, Legislative Council, and House of Assembly, and the superior courts of judicature, are, indeed, the only business transacted in Spanish Town; and it is, at all times, as dull a place as can be found in her Majesty's colonial dominions. The head-quarters of the military force are at Kingston, the troops being quartered in Newcastle Barracks, on the hill above that town.

Mourton Great House, Mourton works and plantation, are on the high road from Kingston (through Port Morant) to Port Antonio, and are about midway from Port Morant to the latter. The estate was formerly the property of George William Gordon; it was sold by him to Mr. Mitchell, of Edinburgh, who has sold it to the Jamaica Cotton Company. The house is said to be one of the finest and the healthiest in the island. The estate was at one time valued at £80,000, with the house built for the residence of the proprietor. Two hogsheads of sugar have been produced on it, but it is now merely cultivated for cotton. The last crop was very small, owing to the heavy wind and rains which prevailed at the time of picking, but it sold at 2s. 4d. the pound on an average. Some of the former year's crop sold at 3s. 9d. and 4s. per lb. Plantains, cocoa-nuts, and bamboo, together with all the tropical fruits, grow on it to perfection. There is no want of labourers, at wages varying from 1s 3d. per day for adults to 6d. for children. Captain Hole and his troops have taken possession of this house during the insurrection, and say, in the despatch to the Colonial Office, that it affords them secure and abundant accommodation. Mr. Bourne, jun., is carrying on an important experiment here in the way of industrial education—the most effectual remedy for the evils complained of, and the surest preventive of future rebellions.

The subject of our third Illustration is the military cantonment and village of Maroon Town, in the Blue Mountains. It derives that name from the neighbouring settlement of the people called Maroons, a mixed race, descended partly from the now extinct aborigines of Jamaica and partly from the runaway negro slaves of a former age, who waged a ferocious war against the British Government till the beginning of this century, when they were finally subdued. We are indebted to Captain the Hon. L. A. Addington, R.A., for the view we have engraved.

The whole island of Jamaica is about 120 miles long by an average width of about thirty miles. It contains about 2,500,000 acres. Jamaica is divided into three counties—Cornwall, Middlesex, and Surrey. Cornwall is at the western end of the island, Middlesex comprises the central parts, and Surrey the eastern. The population amounts to upwards of 450,000, out of which very little more than 10,000 are white. The blacks and coloured people, therefore, are nearly forty to one against the whites, a fact which is a startling commentary upon the late proceedings, as showing with what ease even a badly-organised uprising of the entire black population could exterminate the whites.

As regards that section of the county of Surrey which has been the scene of the late atrocities, the following itinerary of the distances from place to place will help to an understanding of the movements of the troops. Morant Bay is about twenty-five miles from Kingston; and all the localities mentioned in the despatches, except Port Antonio, which is also twenty-five miles from Morant Bay, are within a distance of twenty miles. There is a good carriage-road from Kingston to Port Antonio, through Morant Bay; but the cross roads can hardly be dignified with the name of mule tracks. Several rapid streams cross the main road, and are at this season almost impassable, the water coursing down like a torrent; there are no bridges, and altogether the county is most difficult for troops.

SCENE FROM "THE WATCH-CRY," AT THE LYCEUM THEATRE.

THE performance by Mr. Fechter and his company at the Lyceum Theatre, of Mr. Palgrave Simpson's new historical play has proved more acceptable to a London audience than the critics were at first disposed to predict. The scene represented in our illustration is that of the prison where Silvia, the son of Bianca d'Albizzi, is confined by the tyrant, with orders to put him to death, if the signal be given by the omission of the usual watch-cry from the archers who guard the palace. The hero, Leone Salviati, personated by Mr. Fechter, being aware of this murderous design, himself utters the watch-cry at the window, though he has long feigned to be dumb; and the youth is thus rescued and joyfully recognised by his mother.

THE FENIAN TRIALS.

The Dublin Court of Queen's Bench gave judgment on Thursday week, refusing the application of Luby and others, Fenian prisoners, for a writ of certiorari to remove their trial from the Special Commission now sitting in Dublin to another district.

The Special Commission to try Fenians was opened on Monday by Justices Keogh and Fitzgerald. No great excitement was apparent, but every precaution was taken to preserve the peace. Justice Keogh delivered an able charge. He called upon the jury to do their duty, and publish panic or timorous apprehensions to induce them to swerve from the line of duty. If the spirit of intimidation was abroad, the just and vigorous administration of the law was more than sufficient for its suppression. The grand jury first found a true bill against Thomas Luby, who pleaded not guilty, and traversed to next (Mr. Isaac Butt) raised some legal objections which were overruled. During the counsel's speech the people in the body of the court, Mr. Justice Keogh threatened to have the gallery cleared. Lills were also found against O'Donovan Rossa, O'Leary, Deasy, Kickham, and Meehan on the charge of treason and felony under the Act of 1848, which proclaims a statute of treason and felony misprision.

Luby was on his trial on Tuesday, Mr. Attorney-General, in opening statement, read a great number of documents connecting the accused with Stephens and O'Mahony in the leading spirit of the conspiracy in Ireland and elsewhere. Luby, it was stated, was constituted by Stephens one of the Fenian executive or military committee in Ireland during his absence. The Attorney-General concluded by a denunciation of the conspiracy as being similar to the French Revolution. At the conclusion, it was under consideration during the greater part of the day, and Identified Luby as having acted as secretary to Fenian meetings since the year 1861, and proved the handwriting of Stephens to several documents. He did not break down on cross-examination. Hughes, the detective officer, was examined, but nothing material was elicited.

On the evening of Friday last Stephens, the "head centre," escaped from Richmond Prison, Dublin. The night was wild, gusty, and rainy; early in the morning a warder, Denis Byrne, reported that he had found two tables standing on each other inside the outer wall of the prison, and, on making a search, and Stephens was found to be missing. There were skeleton keys in the locks of his cell, and the door of the outer iron lattice which his cell opened had been unlocked, apparently by the same means. It is thought unlikely that he escaped by raising the wall, notwithstanding the circumstance of the tables, for there could be traced neither scratch on the tables nor footstep on the ground outside. Complicity on the part of the warder Byrne was freely considered an unavoidable conclusion; and the warder Byrne has already been taken into custody, and the authorities have a bold suspicion as to his connivance. To support the latter charge a copy of the Fenian oath was produced, which was found in his drawer, but there is no other evidence at present. He stands remanded. The Governor of the prison, Bridewell, Mr. Martin, has also been suspended by the Lord Lieutenant until the close of the inquiry respecting Stephens's escape. All Dublin is full of conjecture as to the method of Stephens's escape and chances of his capture. The Government have offered a reward of £1000 for his apprehension, and £500 for that of his accomplice in his escape. A true bill for treasonable felony has been found against Stephens.

THE ANGLO-AUSTRIAN COMMERCIAL TREATY.

A DEPUTATION representing several Chambers of Commerce had an interview with Lord Clarendon, on Tuesday, on the subject of the commercial treaty recently between England and Austria.

After hearing the statements of several members of the deputation, Lord Clarendon said there had been considerable difficulties in the Austrian negotiations—difficulties such as had also arisen in the course of the negotiations with the French Government. But it was the most earnest desire of the English Government that a treaty with Austria should be concluded, and he could assure them that no exertion should be wanting on the part of the English Government to bring the negotiations to a favourable termination. Every wish of Austria would be met in a liberal spirit; but there were some points upon which it would be impossible for the English Government to accede. He opened up no wide a field of change in the treaty of 1859 as Austria could have wished, and the changes which they had hardly expected to meet with, and at one time it was feared that the negotiations would break off. But recently offers had assumed a more favourable aspect—indeed, he might express his opinion, perhaps, that the prospects of a favourable issue were more promising than they had ever been, and he sincerely hoped that there might speedily be a satisfactory termination of the negotiations.

Mr. Maxwell Blues, referring to the comparison made by Lord Clarendon between the recent and present state of the negotiations, stated that in the present Austrian Ministry there was to be found a much more liberal spirit than that which had actuated the previous Ministry. Baron Von Reichstadt Wulfsorf, especially, they had found to be a most liberal man, and Baron Von Wulfsorf, especially, had been one of the free-trade principles. Michel Chevalier. He grant Free-trade principles. He could not but think, therefore, that the present Ministry, that in their deliberations on the treaty they would not forget that they had had dealings with any past Austrian Ministry, and took only upon the present Ministry, and that they had the present Government of the Emperor. As showing the existing state of the negotiations, Mr. Blues then read the following despatch which he had just received from a very eminent authority at Vienna:—"Just returned," it ran, "from Minister. Finds the agitation commenced in England very important. Hopes good results. Preliminary contract will be signed this week. It gives a maximum duty of 25 per cent ad valorem, without exception, from the year 1866 reduced to 10 per cent. Austria remains at liberty to make further reduction for the definitive contract of 1868. Also, a reduction of one-third on the duties on wine and corn."

The last of the deputations which had its entire concurrence with the remarks of Mr. Blues as to the dealings of the English Ministry with past and present Austrian governments, and agreed that in Baron Wulfsorff the Austrians had a most enlightened and liberal-minded Minister. Again he assured the deputation that their representations would receive the most careful consideration of the English Government, and expressed a confident hope that the treaty might be speedily concluded, and the commercial union of the great countries finally consummated.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON: SATURDAY, DECEMBER 2, 1865.

THE latest arrival of news from Jamaica makes it absolutely certain that we in England are at present without the means of forming a judgment on proceedings, the severity of which naturally but a single apprehension but a panic may have set honest and honourable men into excess. The first information as to the riot, the savage brutalities of the negroes, and the prompt vengeance of the Executive, of course induced thoughtful persons to inquire into the character of the island officials, and to satisfy themselves as far as possible that the power which had been so unhesitatingly exercised was deposited in trustworthy hands. The name and previous services of Governor Eyre appeared to be a sufficient guarantee that he was not likely to have been betrayed into error by the inhibition of colonial prejudice if He had earned a distinguished reputation in Australia by conduct the very reverse of that which sought by certain persons to be fixed upon him. We have the strongest testimony to his having been the earnest and judicious friend of the aborigines, to his having taken the pains to learn their language, to have gained their confidence; and both resident colonists and gentlemen who have visited Australia alike bear witness to Mr. Eyre's having been, not only a most valuable public servant, but one who had completely conquered all those antipathies which, in many cases, work unfavourably for a native population. Having satisfied ourselves upon this point, and having taken some other circumstances into consideration, we felt that we ought to await the fuller explanations which the Premier has stated that Governor Eyre has been required to furnish. All candid persons must protest against a prejudgment of the case, and against the embittered language which, in the absence of definite knowledge, an angry class has been pouring forth against the white population of Jamaica.

But the later news makes this suspension of judgment a clear and obvious duty. The tidings which have just arrived are so grave that anything like sentence on mere speculation and conjecture would be itself criminal. We learn, and there does not seem any reason to believe the statements to be exaggerated, that executions have taken place on a scale that almost recalls the recollections of the fearful blows which it was found necessary to strike in India after the massacres by the sepoys. We are told that the Governor and the authorities have satisfied themselves of the existence of a widely-extended plot, and that on a given day the mass of the black population was to rise, destroy the comparatively few whites—who are in the proportion of about one to eight or nine blacks—and to constitute a State on the model of that of Hayti, whose proximity to our own island has for years enabled discontented persons of colour in Jamaica to persist in pointing out for unwholesome contrast the conditions of the two populations. Convinced of this, and possessed of evidence which was sufficient in the opinion of the colonial authorities, the Governor has been making the most terrible examples. After allowing for occasional nonsense intended for an excitable and not very intelligent class here, we have no doubt that the object of the colonists has been to strike terror by wholesale execution. It is stated that upwards of a thousand negroes have been put to death, and that the work was by no means considered as at an end. This appalling statement may be in excess of the truth, but it proceeds from those who are the actors in the affair, and who by no means write as men who desire to exercise or palliate the severity they have been exercising. On the contrary, they describe it as the only means of averting a far more shocking calamity—the extirpation of the whites and the loss of the island.

It is much to be regretted that the subject has been at once fastened upon by those who do not reflect the feelings of the community. Englishmen are passionately fond of justice, and, from the highest to the lowest, they instinctively inquire, in any crisis, where the right lies. They are habitually led away from the pursuit of the truth by names and sentiments. The nation will exact the fullest information upon the subject of the executions in Jamaica, and the verdict will be given without favour or affection. But the course which a certain class has taken is calculated to arouse a feeling of advocacy and antagonism which may render it less easy than it would otherwise have been to arrive at a judgment. If a party which endeavours to supply by aggression what it lacks in influence is at once to decide the case, to describe the negroes as martyrs and the executions as a massacre, the nation will not be wanting in the charge the black man as a half-reclaimed savage, and to assert that the decimation of a whole coloured populace is a less evil than the murder of an English colonist. Violence will for a time assume the place of argument, but it will not be successful that the English representatives of a certain sect should take the earliest opportunity of endeavouring to vindicate the conduct of its emissaries and proselytes; and it may be unfortunate for that body that its leaders unfounded accusations and intemperate attacks to its more zealous agents. It is in evidence that some of the missionaries by no means restrict themselves to theological teaching, but that they—and we are not disposed absolutely to find fault for it—have set to refining, as far as they can, to stimulate others to seek the redress of what they regard as social wrong. But this, which would be laudable, or at least harmless, in a settled community, becomes reprehensible policy elsewhere, and is certainly regarded as worse than questionable by these whose lives and welfare depend upon the peaceful working of the present system. We abstain as steadily in this as in the other case from pronouncing any opinion on the proceedings of the sect in question or of its converts; for this issue has to be tried, as well as that raised by the conduct of the authorities; and we think that it would have been wiser in those to whom the task of investigation has instead proclamation of their own goodness and from a furious denunciation of the colonists. The country will not fail to notice the exact attitude of all parties or to observe the exceeding eagerness of others to pronounce a verdict in the absence of evidence.

Either a wicked and cruel slaughter of innocent persons has taken place, or a colony, menaced by the most awful of visitations, has saved itself at a terrible price. The severity of the latter view lies in the presumption arising from the character of one of the best and ablest men in the service of the Crown, and from the natural humanity of English gentlemen. In behalf of the former statement we have nothing at all, but a great deal of not entirely disinterested zeal and the prejudiced advocacy of those who, on most occasions of importance, see force only in anti-English argument. England does not as yet understand the Jamaica question, and will not decide it until she does.

THE OPENING OF PARLIAMENT.—The Queen has graciously announced that she intends, should the state of her health at the time admit of her making the effort, to open Parliament in person. A few modifications will be made in the old ceremonial.

Cabinet meetings are being held in quick succession. Ministers met on Tuesday, and they have been summoned to assemble also on Friday and Saturday (to-day).—In connection with the Ministerial changes, the Globe announces that Mr. Forster has accepted the office of Vice-President of the Council, and is now a member of the Administration. The Times has reason to believe that Lord Augustus Loftus, our Minister at Munich, will succeed Lord Napier as Ambassador at Berlin. Mr. Blackwell Baker, the member for the Montrose Burghs, has declined the invitation to enter the Admiralty as Civil Lord, on the ground that he cannot yet withdraw his attention from the business of which he is the head.—The Right Hon. William Hutt has been made a K.C.B.—The Observer has an article on the new public servants, in the course of which, referring to Mr. Goschen, it says:—"Mr. Goschen has made great material sacrifices to enter upon official life. He was obliged to abandon the highest place in one of the most successful commercial and monetary firms in the City—thereby giving the best evidence of the confidence of a prudent man in the stability of his new career and his alliance upon the colleagues with whom he has to act. It was only on Monday week that he agreed to accept office, after consulting his family and his colleagues in the house of which he was the guiding spirit. On Thursday he took leave of the electors of Liverpool in England at the weekly court, which was more numerously attended than usual, and where he received the sincere congratulations of his colleagues, of all political colours, on his entrance upon his new and more brilliant career, whilst they all regretted his loss from amongst them. On Tuesday Earl Russell received a deputation from Bradford on the subject of reform. In his reply the Premier expressed his regret that the time had not arrived for the extension to the working classes to a share in the franchise, but added that the Government would not introduce a bill till the facts on which it was to rest were fully ascertained.

THE COURT.

THE Queen, with the Crown Prince and Crown Princess of Prussia and the younger members of the Royal family, arrived at Windsor Castle, in the enjoyment of good health.

On Thursday week her Majesty accompanied by Princess Louis of Hesse, walked in the grounds of the castle. Later in the day the Queen, accompanied by Princess Christian, Princess Louis of Hesse, Princess Eathcart, drove out. The Crown Prince and Crown Princess of Prussia, Princess Louise, and Prince Leopold dined in a carriage and four. The Crown Prince of Prussia, attended by Lord Methven and Colonel H. Ponsonby, passed several hours shooting. The Prince and Princess Louis of Hesse, with their children, took leave of her Majesty and left the castle on their return to the Continent. The Duke de Nemours and Princess Marguerite d'Orleans arrived at the castle on a visit to the Queen. Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar also arrived at the castle.

Yesterday week the Queen, accompanied by the Crown Prince and Crown Princess of Prussia, drove in the park. Her Majesty's guests, the Duke de Nemours and Princess Marguerite d'Orleans left the castle for Claremont. Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar arrived in London. Count Gleichen visited the Queen. Earl and Countess Russell arrived at the castle and had an audience of their Royal Majesty.

On Saturday last the Queen, accompanied by the Crown Princess of Prussia and Princess Helena, drove in the castle grounds. Later in the day her Majesty, accompanied by Princess Louisa and Princess Beatrice, drove out. The Earl of Clarendon, K.G., arrived and had an audience of the Queen. The Spanish and Haytian Ministers had audiences of her Majesty on presenting their credentials. The Ministers were presented to the Queen by the Earl of Clarendon, K.G. The Crown Prince and Crown Princess of Prussia and Princess Helena walked out. Princess Louisa and Princess Beatrice rode out. The Crown Prince of Prussia went shooting.

On Sunday the Queen, the Crown Prince and Crown Princess of Prussia, Princess Helena, Princess Louisa, and Princess Beatrice attended Divine service in the private chapel of the castle. The Rev. E. J. Illingworth officiated.

On Monday the Queen, accompanied by Princess Beatrice and attended by the Hon. Mary Lascelles, drove out. The Crown Princess of Prussia and Princess Helena drove out. The Crown Prince of Prussia passed the day shooting. The Queen of the Sandwich Islands, attended by Mrs. Holly, arrived at Windsor Castle and had an audience of her Majesty.

On Tuesday the Queen, accompanied by the Crown Prince and Crown Princess of Prussia, Princess Helena, and Princess Louisa, went to Eton College, and honoured Mr. Hornby, the provost, with a visit at their station. The suite in attendance consisted of Lady Wantage, Lieutenant-General the Hon. Sir C. Grey, Colonel Ponsonby, and Colonel H. F. Ponsonby, and Countess de Bobenthal and Count de Seckendorff in attendance upon the Crown Prince and Crown Princess. Her Majesty, accompanied by Princess Beatrice, was attended by Lady Waterpark and Lord Charles Fitzroy, returned to the castle in the afternoon. The Crown Prince and Crown Princess of Prussia and Princess Helena drove to Buckingham Palace. In the evening their Royal Highnesses honoured the performance at the Sacred Harmonic Society, Exeter Hall, with their presence, returning to the castle by night. The Queen and Princess Beatrice left the castle for London.

On Wednesday the Queen held a Council, at which were present Earl Granville, Earl Russell, Earl De Grey and Ripon, and the Right Hon. Sir George Grey. Mr. Gassiot was sworn and admitted a member of the Privy Council, and appointed Vice-President of the Royal Society. Earl Russell and Earl Granville had audiences of her Majesty. Mr. Helps was Clerk of the Council in Ordinary, and the Rev. Mortimer Sackville West were the Lord and Groom in Waiting. Subsequently the Queen received the Crown Prince and Crown Princess of Prussia and attended by Lord Charles Fitzroy, drove out in a carriage and four. Princess Beatrice, attended by the Hon. Mrs. Bruce, took a drive.

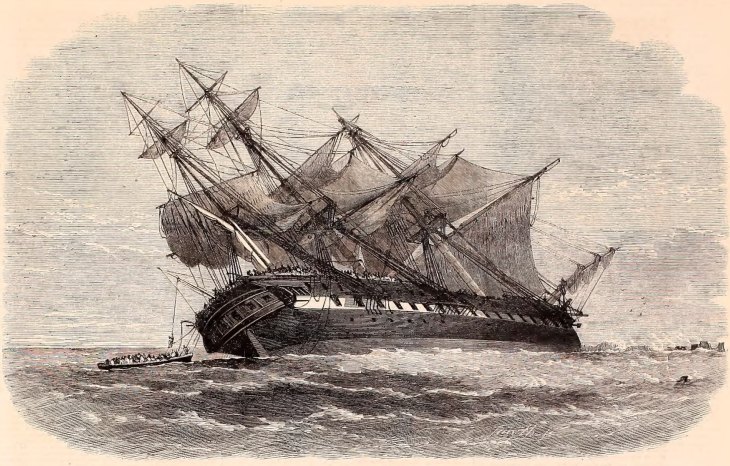
John Howard, the philanthropist, caused, about ninety years ago, a free church to be erected in Bedford, in which he was accustomed to worship, but which is now used by Unitarians. Cardinal Wiseman is the only public movements of a man whom the nation delighted to honour. The Reformation at Bedford is in a flourishing condition, and since the date of the restoration at a cost of about £1600. "I feel sure (says Mr. William Allen, of Bedford), that the Cardinal will see by this statement that we are not to be known to the nation to elicit some tangible proof of its appreciation of self-denial on the part of Christians." Subscriptions may be forwarded through Messrs. Barnard, Barnard, and Wing, bankers, Bedford.

The births (boys and girls) and deaths (males and girls) were registered in London last week. In the corresponding weeks of ten years, 1855-64, the average number of births was 1,496; the number in 1865 was 1,574. The deaths registered in London during the week were 1,171. It was the forty-seventh week of the year, and the average number of deaths in the week is, with a correction for increase of population, 1,061. There were 110 more deaths registered than the average. The deaths registered in the week were 1,171. The deaths registered in the last three weeks were 1,171, 1,171, and 28. No deaths were referred to cholera. Typhus has increased, and the deaths from this disease in the last week of the quarter appear to have died on the 19th inst., in Plough-lane, Battersea, at the age of one hundred years. Five fatal cases of burns and scalds from accidents were registered in the week.—The births registered in London and ten other large towns of the United Kingdom in the week ending Nov. 18 were: deaths registered, 1,171. The annual rate of mortality was 19 per 1000 persons living. In Liverpool the deaths were 278; in Manchester, 211; in Salford, 56; in Birkenhead, 25; in Bolton, 38; in Oldham, 38; in Bradford, 38; in Leeds, 84; in Hull, 38; in Sheffield, 106; in Edinburgh, 101; in Glasgow, 160; in Dublin, 118; in Glasgow—births 310, deaths 207; and in Dublin—births 185, deaths 155. The annual rate of mortality was 19 per 1000 living in London. 33 in Birmingham, and 25 in Dublin: 41 in Liverpool, 41 in Manchester, 31 in Birmingham, 28 in Leeds, 28 in Bristol, 24 in Hull, and 33 in Glasgow.



"SUNSHINE."

It was in the Royal Academy Exhibition of last season that we first had the magnificent picture of "Sunshine" by Solomon, engraved from the Winter Exhibition in Suffolk-street. The favourable impression the work of art then made was not lessened by the change of circumstance that the artist's name was almost new to us. From a second inspection of the picture, now in the gallery of Mr. Lionel Smith, we may employ a sporting phrase—taken a lead of the newer candidates for public favour, whose claims to notice are based upon the merits of their productions among those who have been much longer "making the running."

The scene of the picture, as is evident by the quaint caps and headgear of the women, and also by their dresses and character of physiognomy, is on the fish-frequenting coast of Holland somewhere, we should say, along the seaboard of Picardy or Normandy. The time is early morning, when the golden sunlight, strolling about the neighbourhood, say, of Boulogne or Calais, finds out the fishwives, and their sturdy husbands, the tidal mammon-worship, and sordid, heavy-hearted care, to such a scene, with all its rugged, but picturesque surroundings. It is a busy everywhere along the sea-beach the newly-escaped denizen of the deep is being sold by auction to the highest bidder in the crowd—everywhere is gladness his eyes and warms his heart; it gleams radiant from the white caps—it sleeps in blissful repose on the soft coat of the tufted "dons" or the waves of the sea—it revels in ruddiness on the shingle; it laughs outright as it dances over that gleaming pathway with carpeting of golden light and glittering fringe which leads to the world's edge. Nor is it reflected less pleasantly from the pearly-grey sky, which is not yet ready wholly to cast off the fog and light-hearted fisher-girls of that happy French coast. The picture is one of great merit. The artist has grouped on her chair to indulge in a more complete abandonment of mirth, is but a type of her power, which is essentially humorously-sympathetic. All this cheerful group of women and children the sunshine brings gladness and content, and the old fishwife, who sits apart, is not unhappy, but sad; for, while that sun smiles on them, no shadow of apprehension for husband, father, son, brother, lover, sway reaping the sea, can darken that humble dwelling. Veteren here perhaps, if we look again, we may detect none other shade or lowering dread heightening the moral sunshine, like the thin cloud-shadows which sometimes chequer yonder calm and gentle sea, brightening by contrast its beauteous emerald tinge. In the foreground not within the genial rays sits one whose sun has long passed its meridian, and who has arrived not far from the "Valley of the Shadow:" while to the left, and still nearer to the spectator, stooping over a cradle, is a woman in whose watchful expression we read something like the inexpressible yearning of a mother's fear.

WRECK OF THE DUNCAN DUNBAR, AUSTRALIAN PASSENGER SHIP, ON THE COAST OF BRAZIL.

It has been mentioned that the ship Duncan Dunbar, of London, Captain Swanson, master, which left London on the 28th of August and Plymouth on the 2nd of September, with passengers and cargo, for Sydney, was, on the 7th of October, wrecked on the reef Los Roccos, lying in long. 33° 45' W. and lat. 3° 52' S., on the coast of Brazil. She struck on the reef at about half-past eight in the evening. Every effort was made to get the ship off, but in vain, as she went on at high tide. Soon after the vessel struck, the captain had gone in one of the boats to take soundings round her. As the boats could not carry all on the wreck, he determined to await daylight and then land, if there was any available spot; and, if there was no landing-place, to take all from the wreck in the boats and on a raft. "It is impossible," says the of the passengers, "to describe the state of mind in which we passed the hours of that most awful and trying night. The vessel was rolling from side to side, and striking most violently at each roll, in a way which seemed to threaten her instant dismemberment. As day dawned every glass was used in the hope of discovering some place uncovered by water, on which shelter, if only temporarily, might be taken. The captain again went in a boat, and succeeded in getting through the breakers to a landing-place on one of the two banks or islets of sand which rise about 7 ft. above ordinary high-water mark. Preparations were at once made for landing. Each passenger was covered in a their own property, and that the remains of the materials factories were ranched and the insurgents captured, destroyed, or driven into the woods.

To the treasurer of the Lord Mayor's Fund for the relief of the distress in Lancashire, during the present winter, the following subscriptions are announced:—

Sidney Herbert, the editor and reporter of the Canterbury Cross, a Jew, had been refused admittance to the Grand Jury Room. Stewart, a Catholic, one of the volunteers, by H.M. gun-boat Lily. It is only to be remembered that Mr. Lincoln, at the outbreak of the disturbance, published in his paper an article which created the most violent excitement amongst the Irish population, and was the consequence.

The Governor has been pleased to issue a proclamation, to take effect after the 20th inst., prohibiting any Haytian landing in this island unless furnished with a passport from the Haytian Consul, and also prohibiting the exportation or importation of arms.

The Secretaries of State for the Home Department, Dundas and Nuis River, and at both places burned the negro huts there. Five rebels and been shot by them. They are now in the neighbourhood of Morant Bay, and will be captured.

The relief committee at Cape Town have received from the captain of the United States ship of war Ino 5000 lb. of potatoes who had been received on board from the Lily, and the people, who were in a most destitute condition, are to be relieved. The captain of the Do Soto refused to deliver up the English seamen and sick, but Colonel Hamilton, the British commissioner, has since received from the Bulldog.

Monday night, the day appointed for the Marconi of St. Thomas-in-the-East to visit Kingston, and be received by his Excellency the Governor, must be postponed sine die.

The following extract is from an official despatch, dated Mount Peto Nov. 6, 1861, addressed to Major-General Sir Hope Grant, K.C.B., by his Excellency Major-General O'Connor, C.B.:—

I cannot conclude without expressing my great relief that in this part of the island every probability exists of perfect order being maintained. I consider the enemy, routed as they are, will maintain order; and we have everything to lead to myself, that the inhabitants should not return to their usual occupations with confidence. Mr. Eyre, by his prompt measures, has given every perfect quiet in their neighbourhoods, and that the negroes are returning to their work. The Maroons have performed their duty most satisfactorily. The people who had fled to it on the commencement of the rebellion are rapidly returning to their homes.

"GORDON'S PROCLAMATION."

The Jamaica papers publish the following proclamation issued by Gordon, and headed "State of the Island," which formed part of the evidence on which he was hanged:—

A requisition, numerously signed, for a public meeting to consider "the state of the country" having been presented to the undersigned, his Excellency His Honour has appointed Saturday, the 27th, for public meeting at the Kirkhouse, Spanish Town, Mr. Gordon, and all others who consider that the people will not, on that day, allow themselves to be interfered with by any of those who have already compromised the peace of the country. Arrangements without proper foundation, which has so misled her Majesty's Government, as to induce them to recommend to Parliament, by Mr. Cardwell, Secretary of State, was induced to send to Mr. Eyre to reply to the address of the House of Assembly, presented to him, is well heralded in a loyal spirit. We know that our beloved Queen is the noble-hearted friend of the black man, and that her loyal subjects, whether white, brown, or black, in this island are not to be trifled with. Her Majesty's government has honourable and honest in their intentions, unlikely to succeed in their plans. Mr. Eyre has been recalled, and that for they have been deceived and misled, and the consequence is a serious embarrassment to the country, and a cause of great anxiety to all in their remembrances, and we have no doubt that truth will ultimately prevail. People of St. Ann's, your presence at the meeting on Saturday next, the Naicol people of St. Ann's, you who have no sugar estates to work on or contend after employing your labour, you who have no rum shops to attend, come forth, and protest against the unjust representations made against you by Mr. Cardwell, and the Secretary of State, who have been misled to tell your wives; but you want men free of Government influence—you want men who will not be bought over by rum, or by the sugar planter, and who can appreciate you as such as you are. Be not afraid, but come on the 27th day of July, 1865: Try to help yourselves, and Heaven will help you.

MEETING OF THE LEGISLATURE.

The annual meeting of the Legislature took place on the 7th ult, when the Governor made the following speech:—

Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Legislative Council:

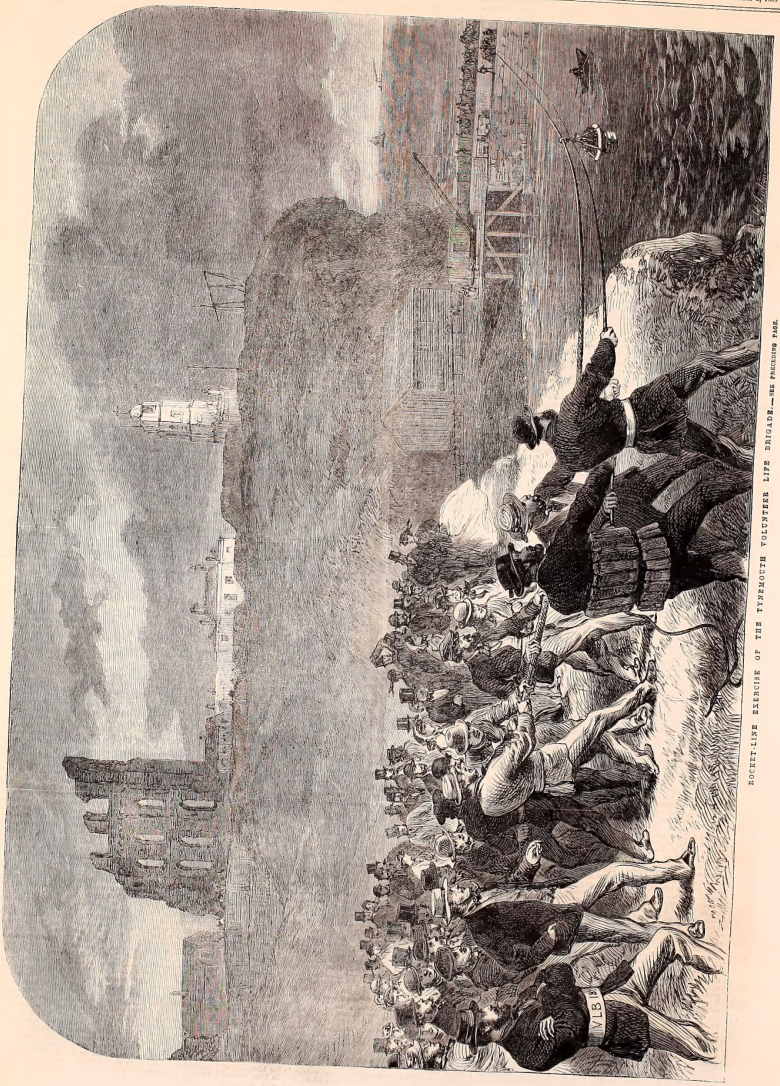
Mr. Speaker and Honourable Gentlemen of the House of Assembly:

It is especially a matter of thankfulness to Almighty God, I trust, that I cannot but feel that the sad and solemn events of the last few weeks impart to our meeting together at this juncture a character of peculiar interest. No more than usually anxious to seek your advice and ask for your co-operation, I feel conscious that the circumstances which call us to the discharge of the Session now being inaugurated will, in all probability, be one of the most important that have occurred in the history of the colony.

The occurrence of a rebellion, however limited in extent, and however speedily it has been suppressed, has brought sorrow and suffering upon the whole community. Many families have been plunged in mourning for the loss of near and dear relatives, and have been mercilessly murdered, while property amounting in the aggregate to be paralleled by the atrocities of the Indian mutiny. A large amount of property has been destroyed, and considerable injury inflicted upon the country, and one of the richest and most productive districts of the colony has been for the present rendered comparatively valueless, and its resources now ready for the harvest.

Through the active co-operation of civil, military, and naval authorities, and through the promptitude and energy displayed by all of them, these events in the land, have been certified (whilst presently assisting in the distress and anxiety

WINTER EXHIBITION OF SKETCHES AND STUDIES IN WATER COLOURS.



OF THE SOCIETY OF PAINTERS IN WATER COLOURS.

Some of the objections made to the establishment, or rather management, of this as a winter auxiliary to the spring exhibition of the Royal Academy, are the same society have in the collection just opened here in great measure to have avoided. The remonstrances of the press and the public must have had the tendency apparent in former winter gatherings to have shocked the tendency character the two exhibitions were intended to be enforced the distinctive character the two exhibitions were intended to have. Most of the artists may not be reasonably regarded as either sketches to send nothing but finished pictures, or more elaborate studies, whether from nature or the artist's own imagination, made for the painter's studies likewise from nature or otherwise, made for the painter's own practise and improvement, or for the purpose of sale, or for the whole of a finished picture. Though, on the one hand, we must not expect to find many works of the latter description to be in such an exhibition as this, yet, on the other, the display is sure to be of high average merit and to possess delightful specimens of interest. It may, however, still be questioned whether the facilities this exhibition presents to the members, and the pleasure it affords to the public are not—and have the appearance of being—at the sacrifice of the principle of the society's prestige, by admitting the productions of unfinished sorts—Messrs. Burton and G. Fripp, for instance, who distinguished themselves.

Fair. The first contribution of the details remind us of the literal draughtsman, while certain of the details remind us of the seen renderings of the symbols of. The second is tribute of character, in so-called "quick drawings," in the scale of nature, and of the truthful life, and invention; but the exactness of the whole, and the want of color by shading, create a sense of confusion and over-crowding hardly warranted by the subject. One of Shields has, besides, a touching drawing in chalk, entitled "The Orphans;" but the peculiar Willcox-like qualities of his real power, could be detected, and in which power is displayed in the highest degree, indicated in a small water-colour drawing, called "Evening Recreation" (181). From half a dozen contributions by Mr. J. D. Watson, which, though individually of no great importance yet, taken in the painter's versatile ability, we may select "Sunday Morning," a droll pencil study (for a picture) of a tailor crucially announcing the latest "news" from the work-board. In Mr. Lundgren's drawings, we have one memorable, success, has attempted none but comparatively trivial subjects, affording any of the power of the best of narrative pictorial subjects, and expression of "A Reminiscence" (405) is one of. He is only represented by a study of "A Reminiscence" (405) is one of the latest of Jevenuhle, with a hand on tapping the upper fringes of the leaves and spring flowers, and an old woman gathering some of which is hardly shadow beneath—a subject the genius of Mr. Lundgren for such a worked out, whilst the intended effect is disturbed as much as heightened by the two objects are not sufficiently distinct. Mr. Lundgren has another drawing too for by means of a series of "Pencil" (5)—a subject, by-the-way, which, unfortunately for Mr. Lundgren, reminds one that it is a subject which great colourist Lundgren, reminds one that it is a subject which great colourist can compete with in the painting of such a subject as this. This heaviness is, of course, less felt in a drawing than in a picture, the colour, so the "Arab Woman" (10) is a very fine study of the head also, painting directly from nature, the result is a certain conventional inclination is evident; and there is the trace of a certain conventional prettifying tendency betrayed when he draws on the face. But the wonderful in small height; in the second a homely old couple are chatting by the fireside. In Mr. Goodall's "Arab Woman" (10) the first Copid has position in "Spring and Winter," in the second a homely old couple are chatting by the fireside. In Mr. Goodall's "Arab Woman" (10) the first Copid has position in "Spring and Winter," in the second a homely old couple are of form can be obtained by the simple means of a series of "Pencil" coarsest paper. Mr. Boyce—the very antipodes of Mr. Lundgren, for, taking and avoidance of elaborate detail, and of picturesque rather than to be injudiciously called in the aid of photographic accuracy—may, takes a more exquisite pencil, and produces a somewhat stark daylight, master than reverse, the apparent artistic insensibility is relieved by the sharp character, the apparent artistic insensibility is relieved by the sharp character, the apparent artistic insensibility is relieved by subject or point of view observed in a delicious "Old Bridge and Buildings at Durham" (288), a sketch of Newcastle homestage; and a study of a portion of the north side of St. Mark's, Venice (49). The last, though dated 1854, looks exactly like a coloured copy of a photograph, by Bisson, of, if we remember right, the same part of the church. It is chiefly remarkable, like the interior of a church at Giorniso (156), for the method that these drawings are with little positive depth in the shadows, and with a general want of reserve by their local truth, yet none will question the truth and the highest art-value. When Mr. Boyce gives us a bit of effect after sundown (79), we get more of the unanalyzed mental impression than of the actual scene.

None other of the younger members of the society are seen to advantage. There are Weber studies by Mr. Whittaker, in the broad, finished style which struck us as notable for indication of power, and richness of color, in the Academy exhibition; but we miss in these drawings the artistic sentiment which we have seen in former productions. Mr. A. Hunt, which, with kaleidoscopic inlay of the pencil, the manner of Mr. A. Hunt, which, with kaleidoscopic inlay of all the positive colours, makes a very pretty picture, but which merely eyesight as does the stereoscope, yet which rewards with lively glimpses of tender-ly-felt truth and poetry. Mr. Dobyedkin's "Valley," Britain Valley," and "A View up the Dobyedkin Valley." Mr. Britain Willis, in addition to many capital studies of Welsh scenery, which appears in a rather new character in a considerable number whose "Scarborough" (162). Mr. S. Read is another than might be expected from the artistic compass in here found to be well-executed specimens of the very vigorous sketches tution as an architectural draughtsman, which has proved of Highland Bothies—"Corbuilin Hills, in Skye" is delineated in the wild beauty of the subject, and the truth of home as in design and in these very diverse subjects is equally true. Mr. Leitch, a leading painting portraits of Sir. Michael Leitchgow, or the stately "Tomb of Frederick III., in St. Stephen's, Vienna," are of the highest excellence, and admirable for its appropriateness of subject, its excellent light and shade, and perspective. Mr. Davidson, another of the leading painters by superintendence, though, in common, very of honest labour must due to the increasing ability which grows out of contributes charming likewise he gives to Mr. S. F. Jackson, who contributes charming small drawings from about Bettwys-Coed, and the value of evidently haunts of Arthurian romance at Tintagel, the cradle of the Crimean Sir Walter Scott. Mr. Goodall, faithful records also attached to some remembrances of the Goodall War by Mr. E. Goodall. The artist's brother, Mr. W. Goodall, has exhibited nothing more natural and less conventionalised by subrequest studio work than his boy with donkey (107). Mr. A. P. Newton is hard and unpleasing in "Venice" (95); but he has two a three beautiful small studies of "Ben Cruachan" (75), with the snowy summit ridge pale and ghostly against the deep blue sky, is the most impressive. Mr. Rossiter's large study of a girl's head with long yellow hair is "sculptured" and sponging, and looks like a mass of wax. Mr. Boyce, as usual, paints a perfect sketch of a simple subject in "Stone of Stones," a most delicate study of colour, the "Shrine of St. Francois" (217), by Mr. A. Fripp, is a very fine study of the Gothic details of Italian sculpture, and the hand and surface of the figure are prayed for a most delicate study of flesh. Mr. Andrews, if he does not always succeed in his subjects from all the four quarters of the globe on occasion send subjects from all the four quarters of the globe, yet finds a tolerable subject in "Interior of the Coliseum by moonlight" (141). The fine drawing of the Coliseum by moonlight (141) is worthy of the name, we could not give it. Spirited and interesting also are the sketches of Mr. Burgess, and the interesting also are the sketches of Mr. Burgess, and the interesting also are the sketches of Mr. Burgess, and the "Ancient Timber Church at Borgund, Norway" (159), together with a terrible representation of "Norwegian Smuggling" (159), together with a terrible representation of "Port, Holland," and "Interior of Church at Delft, Holland," and the views of "Port, Holland," and "On the Yare, Norfolk" (5). The two last, however, are rather trying to the eyes from the predominant colour, which is unreal and destructive of breadth.

Mr. Lee, the well-established public favourites appear in renewed force. He is delightful to see with what directness he will generate at once to the very heart of his subject, and with the penetrates at once to the very heart of his subject, and with the most unerring certainty, precisely those points of light, shade, and lovely chromatic effect, which will most completely secure the true focus of interest, and which will most completely secure the true focus of interest, and which will most completely secure the sketch, instead of being left with a few unmeaning lines. Mr. Lee's contributions are "The Cartoon Gallery, Knole" (11), and finished sketch of the same subject, "Interior of the Cartoon Gallery" Nos. 274, 842, and 349 are beautiful examples of the same kind of art, and must be exchanged for any amount of the truest sense, and not to be confounded for imperfect. The artwork which should obscure such perfect examples of finished sketching. Still more rare and surprising, perhaps, though scarcely so beautiful, is Mr. Lee's "Study in Rome," in which the human life and motion by touches of a few pencil strokes, and by a method which must be a great marvellous certainty and rapidity, and in which the true and vivid extent, draughtsman can conceive that one or two of his very finest pictures have been produced by the same process. We may sketches seem, at the first glance, to be mere "Study for a Drawing—Calling Hounds out of Cover" (189), a study of a huntsman on a hard-trotting horse, and

PROFESSOR MASSON.

THE recent appointment of Mr. David Masson to the professorship of Rhetoric and Belles Lettres in the University of Edinburgh seems to have been hailed with satisfaction by all those of his own countrymen who belong to the literary profession. He is in every respect a worthy representative of the present generation of Edinburgh scholars, who are characterised, perhaps, by a greater variety of discursive knowledge and a bolder reach of speculation than those of the time of Dugald Stewart, though it is imputed to them that they are less careful of those niceties and proprieties of style which are best preserved by the constant study of classical models. Personally, in London as well as in Edinburgh, Mr. Masson has deservedly enjoyed the friendship and esteem of a very large circle of his fellow-labourers in the occupation of authorship, as well as of the students of University College, where he has filled the chair of English Language and Literature since the year 1852. He is a native of Aberdeen, and forty-three years of age. He was educated at Marischal College, Aberdeen, and subsequently at Edinburgh, but was scarcely twenty years old when he undertook the editorship of a provincial newspaper, which he left in 1844, coming to London with the intention of freely using his pen as an independent writer. For a twelvemonth only he remained in this metropolis, contributing a little to Fraser's Magazine and to other publications of that day; but, returning then to Edinburgh, entered into special engagement with Messrs. W. and R. Chambers, while keeping up and extending his connection with several journals and reviews, both in Edinburgh and London. In 1847, he again came to reside here, and has continued among us ever since; till now, as was humorously remarked by himself in his speech upon a late occasion, he sets the example of a proceeding, which the malicious satirists of the last century would have declared quite impossible—that of a Scotchman going back to Scotland of his own accord. Professor Masson, however, belongs to both parts of our country, and to the whole community of the British nation; since he may be claimed for London by right of his dwelling here for the best part of his active life, and of his intimate association with many of the most popular London men of letters. His writings consist for the most part of critical essays, some of the best of which made their first appearance in the North British Review, the British Quarterly Review, and Macmillan's Magazine; the last-named journal having been conducted by him, as the responsible editor, from its commencement, in 1859. Two volumes of his miscellaneous papers, under the title of "Essays, Biographical and Critical, chiefly on British Poets," were published about ten years ago. He has made a special study of Milton, and had already, in 1859, issued the first volume of a "Life of Milton, narrated in connection with the political, ecclesiastical, and literary History of his Times;" but this important work is yet unfinished. In another volume, "British Novelists and Their Styles: being a Critical Sketch of the History of British Prose Fiction," his faculties of literary taste and discernment are shown with equal force. But it is by his recent essay on the metaphysical controversies between the late Sir William Hamilton and Mr. John Stuart Mill, in a volume named "Modern British Philosophy," which appeared three or four months ago, that Professor Masson has proved himself capable of dealing with such arduous and subtle philosophical discussions as seem to be most congenial to the Scottish mind. As a reviewer, it has been well said of him that "he has exercised the highest function of criticism—not fault-finding, but judgment, valuation, appreciation—which looks for positive rather than negative qualities, and gives a wide, generous, true, and sympathetic estimate of merit."

The friends of Professor Masson in London, to the number of a hundred or more, gave him a farewell dinner, at the Freemasons' Tavern, on the eve of his departure, a month since, to take the chair at Edinburgh University, vacated by the death of the late Professor Aytoun. Mr. Stansfeld, M.P., who presided on that occasion, spoke with high praise of the character and accomplishments of this gentleman, whose acquaintance he had formed in the course of his efforts to help the cause of Italian freedom some fifteen years ago. Mr. Masson, indeed, is known for a stanch and warm-hearted Liberal politician as well as a literary scholar; and in the recent election of Mr. J. S. Mill for Westminster he spoke at St. Martin's Hall.

The portrait we have engraved is from a photograph by Messrs. J. and C. Watkin, of Parliament-street.

EXPLORATIONS IN AUSTRALIA.

THERE paper on Australia were read in succession at the meeting on Monday, of the Royal Geographical Society, at Burlington House—the president, Sir Roderick Murchison, in the chair. The first described an overland journey from Rockhampton to Cape York, by Messrs. Jardine, who set out for that purpose in April last, and arrived safely at the colonial station of Somerset. The journey occupied nearly seven months, during which time the two brothers, both young men, suffered great hardships from the difficulty of cutting their way through the bush and of crossing numerous and rapid creeks and deep rivers; and they were several times attacked by the natives, armed with spears. Most of the latter were overcome during the journey, one of them having been stung by poisonous snakes. The object of the journey generally was to search for fresh favourable for settlement, though millions of acres of rich pasture land were seen on both sides of the great elevation at one part of their progress.

The second paper was on the recent discovery of a route between Rockhampton and the Valley of Lagoons, by Mr. Dalrymple. The difficulty of effecting a passage across the table-land of mountains and ranges described to be almost insurmountable, except by taking advantage of occasional gaps through which watercourses traverse to the sea. Rockingham Bay, where the settlement of Cardwell has been established, was the proceeded to be the finest bay, with the exception of Port Jackson, along the whole coast of Australia, and the natural advantages of the situation were said to be very great. Coal, timber, and water, suitable for ships, are said to be abundant, and the finest vegetables were to be found in the valleys where abound. Mr. Dalrymple understood among the ridges in his exploration, but he succeeded in making his way inland a distance of about 160 miles. The foregoing papers have been sent to the colony of the Governor of Queensland.

The third paper described a best voyage of 1600 miles along the north and west coast of Australia, by Mr. Saco. It appeared that Mr. Saco was one of a party of settlers at Port Adam, on the north-west coast of Australia, and, when communication with the colony was cut off by the rebellion, he and his friends from the outside of a ship, sailed westward in the expectation of arriving at some place where they could get help. They encountered, however, extremely disappointed. The coast was completely exclusive, and the land the interior was perpendicular and vast parts, producing navigation extremely dangerous, and more than once their boat was nearly upset. At length they got to Swan River, and they were in danger of starving when they reached a small settlement at Port Gambier, but the station of the settlers was not much better than their own. The natives of any sign of life and of vegetation and the great part of the west coast was most depressing, but the south coast was found to be more favourable. At length at Port Adelaide they fell delighted at once more again within the range of civilised life. The paper was to the nature of a log, and it was so long that a large portion of it was necessarily omitted.

Sir Charles Nicholson made some observations on the establishment of Queensland for colonisation, and on the extreme fertility and richness of the soil, which he had personally traced remarkably with that of the west. In his opinion a meridian line of longitude would form the best of the west territory into habitable and uninhabitable parts; most of the former being eminently adapted for settlement, with the exception by a civilised population, while the western parts were only fit for a pastoral occupation.

A few observations were also made by Captain Richards and the president.

THE MARKETS.

COVENT GARDEN, Nov. 27.—The supply of English salad on sale here to-day was only moderate. Sub-acid samples found of steadily, at late rates. Cucumbers, mushrooms, and tomatoes were rather scarce. Foreign grapes, the produce of which was only moderate, ruled heavy, on former terms. In fruiting purposes of green only a limited business was transacted. Apples, pears, and nuts were in fairly active request, at full prices.

THE BONFIRE ON THE GREEN.

THE SHOOTING PARTY COUNTING THE HEAD OF GAME.—SEE NEXT PAGE.

MEMBERS OUT OF PARLIAMENT.

THE process of Ministerial reconstruction, about which everyone who is interested in public affairs is talking so much just now, has taken a turn which is especially significant. The accession of Mr. Cardwell to office is naturally considered in many respects a coup for Ministers; but peculiar and special importance attaches to the distinct adhesion to the Russell Government of Mr. W. E. Forster, the member for Bradford. From the moment of the new premiership, when our future policy was discussed, one heard it said that if Mr. Forster could be induced to take a place under Lord Russell—or rather, perhaps, looked to the more potent influence over the political act you has in such a case, under Mr. Gladstone—there could be but one course of resolution. Although a man who, in his speech, is wholly free from the habitudes of the donnegrue, Mr. Forster is, nevertheless, a decided politician, and has spoken his opinions at all times and under all circumstances, with a clearness and precision that have left no doubt as to the terms on which alone he could join a Government even in the most subordinate office, though, by-the-way, the general conjecture was that he could not condescend to be called exactly subordinate to any one. In this the observers of his character and proclivities as a politician have been mistaken, for he enters upon official life in the regular under-secretariat fashion, and, for aught that is yet known, does not stipulate for the factitious distinction of a Privy Councilor, which would enable him to put the semi-ennobling words "Right Honorable" before his name. Perhaps, believing his sole ambition he may be indifferent or even object to this vainglorious designation, although it may not be, as a laughingly said of Mr. Bright, a distinct objection to taking office that he should be thus called. Considerably a member of the Society of Friends, the son of a missionary-minister of that body, the nephew of Sir Fowell Buxton, and the son-in-law of Dr. Arnold, of Rugby, Mr. Forster's social position is peculiar, and such as individually to induce and maintain that political independence which he has hitherto exhibited. His consent to enter an Administration is however responsible a character (and one can conceive scarcely any less responsible and prominent than that of the Under-Secretary of the Colonies with the chief of that department, as ambitious working functionary in the same House of Parliament) is simple evidence of the being fully satisfied with the premise of the policy to be pursued. Indeed, as things are, Mr. Forster's action towards the Russell Ministry is more indicative of confidence and trust than it had been taken into the Cabinet as Minister, in a sense he would be a power and an influence.

This declension is much strengthened by an examination of the speech which Mr. Forster has just delivered to a body of his constituents at Bradford, and to express an opinion on the question of Parliamentary reform. At the time he was addressing the electors he must have considered to become Under-Secretary for the Colonies, and the state of his mind is easily to be traced in his speech. Very naturally it is forged with a reluctance to enter into debate, and there was manifest hesitancy which was the inevitable result of a certain crippledness of wing which he had undergone, and of which he was feeling the first consciousness. Though rather sing-ong in his delivery, Mr. Forster is usually outspoken in sentiment and opinion, though for the most somewhat in language, and, therefore, the care which he took to be precise on the principle of reform only was sufficiently significant. We could blame a politician who had just given in his allegiance not merely to a political leader but to an official chief, for duping his constituents to shut their eyes, and, after having opened their mouths merely to take in the extension of the franchise, to keep them there open and to wait until they found what Earl Russell dropped into them, they being prepared to shape their orifices so that they might receive the gift perpendicularly or tentacularly, as the case may be. If the concrete father of reform is able to avoid the measure, to which the statement of Mr. Forster is tantamount, it is more than implication, dredged him, so that it will be easily and gratefully swallowed by the honorable gentleman, undoubtedly, if he be brought to an able conjuctor in those dentes which must cause; but, if it should prove otherwise, Mr. Forster will be sure to accept the morale which is the regular badge of imitate under-secretaryship.

Amongst the works which have been published by electors and accepted by members, there has occurred a banquet which was open and obvious in proclaiming that the latter had not come merely to dew eye, and from dew eye to morn again, and that without even the grossest which other people afford themselves. Some passes at the end of sentences which, in writing, are represented by punctuation. Except that now and then there appears to be a touch of that of Jacques' stricken deer, he does not seem ever to take breath; and his thought, not, on the whole, weak and washy, seems to be everlasting. He often makes good points and says many good things, but it is the habit of his friends faultlessly to cheer with all their might; but, as may be supposed, they are a grab or rush, such a hallooing tide of words as characterises his speaking, the solid matter exhibits itself pretty much in the way in which some cricketers' bats are squeezed which once and again have been projected over the falls of Niagara. On the occasion at Leominster the fluency was most useful to Mr. Hardy. He was the founder of the feast; he was the chairman; he was the chosen member of the party; although he was not one of them. He had to propose most of the toasts and to respond for a great many of them, and he may have been supposed to have been in his glory. It is more justice to say that he accomplished with the tact and good-breeding which might have been expected from one so essentially a gentleman, preserving just so much of the political character of the occasion as was necessary, and stimulating its social character to the highest point at which enjoyment of the latter should culminate, and no further. The mode in which he spoke of his triumph as Mr. Gladstone was not calculated to offend a strong and good taste; and, in short, the qualities which he displayed as his farewell meeting with his friends of Leominster were such as thus to that almost enthusiasm with which Mr. Hardy is always greeted and supported by his friends in the house whenever he rises.

At the banquet the electors of Leominster had an opportunity of renewing their ties to the new member when they returned at the late election with Mr. Hardy—and, indeed, when they went to the poll. Mr. Arthur Walsh is, probably, about to train himself in a borough; for the representative of the county of Radnor, which the latter, Sir John, has held so long as to have made it almost an heirloom for the Walshes. Whether it would be desirable for the aspirant member to set up his gaps as a model for imitation, we have to get the next Radnor election before we can say to say; but it may be remarked that, as a rule, Sir John has not been successful in that respect, inasmuch as his predecessors are generally made principally for the delectation—the performance of a duty by a pleasurable—of the Speaker. However, the young member seems glib enough, and may possess some of his progenitor's redoubtable dicegard of adverse circumstances—an excellent quality in a would-be orator. Thither, too, came Mr. King-King, who is also to suggestive by an obvious concatenation of ideas of the nomenclature which, after he attached to a double-barrelled name, he was, by representative, is a personage in Herefordshire; and Sir James Bailey, one of the members for that county, who was returned unopposed satisfactorily, from the country gentlemen point of view; and so no more said about them.

The process of conferring dyppepsia upon its members is still going on briskly in North Warwickshire, and Mr. Newdegate and Mr. Davenport Bromley are dining themselves to death in the cause of their county—as much so, indeed, that it was hardly necessary for Mr. Bromley to assure a body of licensed victuallers over whom, in festivity assembled, he presided that he was no advocate of total abstinence, which, in truth, he sufficiently proved when he protested against the provision made for the inmates of night-refuges and produced to the House of Commons a specimen of the slices of bread which were set before those and and hungry individuals. There has been Mr. Adderley, too, who is nearly as much Warwickshire as he is Staffordshire, communing with some of his constituents who believe in him, over that kind of feast, probably, which used to be known, in the days to which Captain Grenow's "Reminiscences" apply, as "a rump and dozen." This right hon. gentleman was as oracular as ever, and talked in a very pooh-pooh style about the prospects of that sort of Parliamentary reform of which the appointment of Mr. Forster has given earnest; and his ideas on the subject culminated in a prophecy that the Russell Ministry would not be in office that day six months—not by any means a superhuman prognostic.

THE DUBLIN EXHIBITION MEDAL

As a final token of the winding up of the Dublin International Exhibition, we present an illustration of the Prize Medal, designed by a Belgian artist, and manufactured in the Exhibition Palace, under the superintendence of the Executive Council. The device, it will be seen, is simple and intelligible, requiring for its proper interpretation a winged and half-draped female figure, bearing an ample horn of plenty, between one and sea; the height of the Exhibition Palace, with various emblems of art and industry, is visible on the ground beneath, with a host of labourers; under the figure on the reverse side of the medal is a wreath of the national plants intertwined with the names of the four quarters of the globe and surmounted by the Irish harp and Royal crown.

VISIT OF THE PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF WALES TO MELFORD HALL.

MELFORD HALL, near Sudbury, in Suffolk, the property of Captain Sir William Parker, but the residence at this time of Lord and Lady Alfred Paget, was honoured, as we stated last week, by the visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales, on Tuesday, the 21st ult., and their Royal Highnesses stayed over Friday, returning to the Prince's country house at Sandringham, in Norfolk.

The Illustration on our front page gives a view of Melford Hall, taken at the time of their arrival. This mansion is a fine example of the Elizabethan style of architecture, with a quadrangle, and two octagonal towers surmounted with turrets in front, and four towers of similar design on the western front of the main building. It faces the spacious park, on whose undulating slopes hundreds of cattle might find pasturage. The park is well wooded, and the grounds on the estate are tolerably well stocked with game. The hall, which is separated from the village of Long Melford by a winding stream and a brick wall covered on the side next the road with admirably-trained fruit-trees, presents, with its quaint-looking turrets, a very picturesque appearance; and from its connection in some measure with the village, but also of the village green, with the venerable ancient church.

The Prince and Princess, on arriving, about four o'clock, at the Melford railway station, were met by Lord Alfred Paget, Lord Proby, and Lord Suffield, and conducted, in a carriage and four, to Melford Hall; the road being thronged with people and decorated with triumphal arches of evergreens and flags. The yeomanry cavalry and the volunteers, under the command of Major Parker, formed an escort from the park gates; a procession being then formed by the Oddfellows' Lodges, with several bands of music. Their Royal Highnesses thus drove up to the hall with considerable festive pomp, and were soon received within its hospitable walls. A few hours later, there was a grand illumination, and on the green near the hall, concluded by a huge bonfire. The whole village was already illuminated, and the bells and other devices in use being seen on all hands. The carriage drive in the park was lit up with lamps, and the entire mansion, from the basement to the A, in gas, gave a very good effect to the east or main front. Within the house there was a ball, to which many of the county families were invited.

On the following day (Wednesday) the Prince, accompanied by the visitors staying at the hall, went in the afternoon to shoot in Spelthorne Wood, about 300 head of game were shot, including 181 pheasants. His Royal Highness killed with his own gun sixty pheasants, thirty hares, and forty rabbits. Whilst the gentlemen were shooting, her Royal Highness, accompanied by Lady Paget in one carriage and Lady Suffield and the Hon. Mrs. Coke in another, took a drive to Sudbury. On Thursday the Prince went to shoot in the Lineage Wood, and had very good sport; on Friday there was a regular battue in the covers in the park, and the slaughter was immense.

Mr. Ambrose Sechiari laid the foundation-stone of a new Greek church, on Monday, at the corner of Upper Parliament-street and Prince's Park-road, Liverpool.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

History of the American War. By Lieutenant-Colonel Fletcher. Vols. I., II. (Richard Bentley.) The scale (not only as regards cubic inches, avoirdupois weight, and kindred characteristics, but also in respect of the labour freely bestowed by the author and the deep interest he evidently felt in the subject he has undertaken to write about) on which these two volumes have been produced lead to the conclusion that the author intended his history when completed to be—so far as Englishmen at least are concerned—the history of the American War. As matters certain that when the author began his work the time had not come, and it is doubtful whether the time has yet come, for a satisfactory history of the most recent eventful struggle which all but rendered for ever ridiculous the idea, cherished by many worshipful politicians, of a single gigantic station stretching from the shores of the Atlantic to the Pacific and governed by the voice of the people as by the voice of God, and which threatened to rival the fairies of the East in the extent of its historic traffic in human flesh, to stop the propagation of the Monroe doctrine, and to forthwith annex Mexico, Canada, and such purchases in any way near from the West who saw some astrological meaning in the conjunction of the stars and stripes. Passions are not yet cooled; Prejudice has not yet removed the beam from her own eye; Justice cannot properly hold the scales till the beauties which in the turmoil of parties was torn from her eyes has once more been replaced; and Time is not yet sufficiently removed from the present to see the wonderful of the menacing attitude of War. Truth was drowned in the mystic well ages ago, and therefore she cannot be expected to appear in person; and her subordinate who still reverence her memory and attempt to discharge her functions, have scarcely yet had time to investigate any matters connected with the memorable West of Secession. Colonel Fletcher is impartial with the impartiality of one who has a bias in one direction counterbalanced by a bias in another; he was apparently led by personal friendships to sympathize with the Federals, and by general considerations with the Confederates; and he can possibly enter into the feelings of the self-examining advocate who satisfied his conscience that he had proved that he had more than well-merited hanging as many as he had got sentenced to unmerited hanging, and that, on the whole, justice had been done. It will be strange if Unionists do not fancy they detect in Colonel Fletcher's tone a decided leaning towards the Confederates, whether he be discussing the grounds of secession, or narrating the gallant deeds of Confederate men and Confederate ships, or exalting Mr. Davis and disparaging Mr. Lincoln. The latter is frequently alluded to or alluded to in just such contemptuous terms as one might expect the gentlemen in command of Confederate ships to use. But the bullet of war, if no personal scent in the victim, has rendered detraction sugatory and Abraham Lincoln will be remembered as long as honest and perhaps as honoured as George Washington, pater patriæ. Colonel Fletcher uses little or no English epigram in the commencement of the struggle; he tells the story of the "Star of the West" and Fort Sumter, the firing upon the flag of the United States, which kindled in all Christendom a feeling similar to that described in the words, > a fiery wind on them,

> A fiery family passion for the storm
> Of Launcelot, and a glory one with theirs,

the bloodless defeats, the ultimate evacuations; but he does not, perhaps wisely, mention the derision with which the leading English journal and its readers received the news that we have made merry over the want of sport when only two men were killed, and that not until the first battle in which their own flag; and how pleasures were made about the probable amount in the end of the "butcher's bill." A wholesome lesson might have been read, and a touching contrast might have been drawn between prophecy and reality, at the commencement of the strife landing-article writers and thoughtless readers laughed merrily at the angel of death, and that as a right to smile, for he has reaped a goodly harvest. But perhaps we are getting into political byeways. It may, however, be interesting to remark by the way that, according to a certain account, Two bullet-proof men were being fallen over by thousands at tens of leaf." Colonel Fletcher is not responsible for, nor does he mention, this statement. It is to be found in the Atlantic Monthly during the campaign of 25,186 killed, wounded, and missing." The fact of Colonel Fletcher's volumes is devoted to the first year, and the second to the second year of the war. The first ends at a period when victory was beginning to smile on the Federal arms, when Island No. 10 had, by the capture of Forts Pillow and Wright, been captured; when New Orleans had fallen, dragging down with it Forts Jackson and St. Philip; when the Memphis Navy Yard had been destroyed, and when all hope of Confederate successes by sea was abandoned. The second ends with the evacuation of Gettysburg, during which there were fought on three successive days three pitched battles, followed by the rout of the Confederates, which, Unionists are fond of remembering (though Colonel Fletcher, so far as our memory can be trusted, does not mention the fact), took place on the same day on which Vicksburg surrendered, on the anniversary of July. Colonel Fletcher had many advantages in his endeavours to obtain an insight into the events of both years of the war, and eye-witness of many events; but the accounts of many eyewitnesses are contradictory, and at the same event one of each its features can be accurately portrayed. It is said that General Lee to himself about to write the history of his own campaigns, and when he has written it there will be one contribution towards an accurate history of the war. But as the Generals Grant and Sherman and subordinate officers, both Federal and Confederate, follow General Lee's plan, and should do so, Colonel Fletcher has a truthful account of the international questions which have arisen, been settled, and remain to be settled, possibly may have a more trustworthy and more instructive narrative than has ever yet followed the completion of a war. Meanwhile Colonel Fletcher's history may take no mean place among the works of a interesting character, and its sufficient, useful maps, and descriptions easily and yet graphically written. It does not display the noble style of a Napier, but it is free from pretentiousness and other disagreeables. The author does not seem to belong to any particular school of worshippers, some spites of censure or similar ingredient, and therefore one looked with some curiosity to see whether he would succeed or completely the report which identifies the Confederate General Marmaduke with a Mr. Marmaduke Constable, who, however, as we have been informed by a friend that fled to information upon the point.

Little Faces. By Mr. H. B. Stowe. (Bell and Daldy; Sampson Low, Son, and Marston.) The wise man sings, in Canticles ii. 15, "Take us the foxes, the little foxes, that spoil the vines," and apply, by, after the fashion of the Jews, to the adherents of a country like the language of the singer, Mrs. Stowe has written a series of excellent essays upon the training of the unreached, insignificant little creature that nibble away domestic happiness." She displays her usual insight into human hearts, her usual thoughtfulness, and her usual charm of composition.

Life's Quiet Voices. By Mrs. George Cranley Bowles. (Trübner and Co.) An earnest, hopeful, reverent, and sensible spirit pervades the little volume, which consists of both prose and verse. The few pages of prose are apparently intended to console and cheer by reasonable suggestions rather than emotionally by rhetorical platitudes, those whose bright visions of life have dissolved, or are dissolving away. The verses are the result of similar but more successful efforts in particular mention of the late Prince Consort, whose character and religious views are briefly, and with admiration, commented upon. It would have been more easy to pronounce an opinion upon the poetry had the author's views upon the exigences of metre, rhythm, and rhyme been explained in a preface, as the usual laws are not strictly observed.

Six Months Amongst the Charities of Europe. By John de Leifde. (Alexander Strahan.) Two sturdy volumes upon a subject dear to philanthropists. The portions relating to the Rauhe Haus and Kaiserswerth will remind one of "Praying and Working;" but the other efforts are, so far as we are aware, less known to Englishmen, unless they may now and then touch upon questions dealt with by Mr. Jerrold in his "Children of Lutetia." The pages are illustrated by, it is to be hoped, uncomplimentary portraits of persons and by ordinary-looking representations of places.

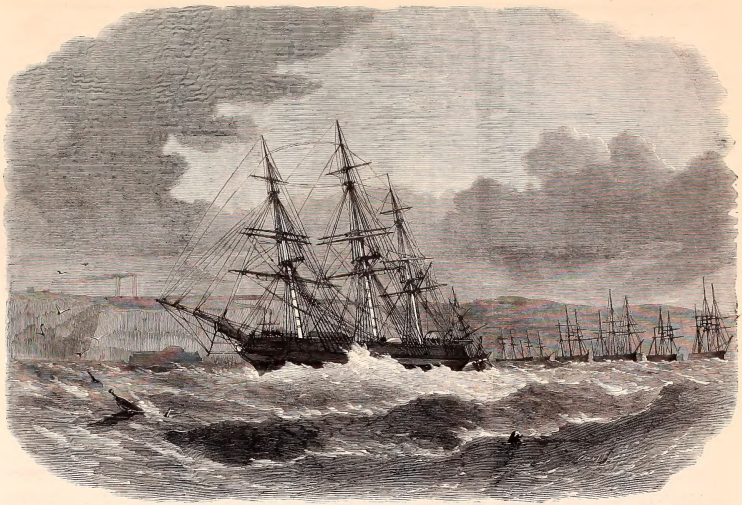
Attention is requested for the following books, most of them being profusely, and some gorgeously illustrated:—Lizzie Leigh and other Tales, by Mrs. Gaskell; Romantic Tales, by the Author of "John Halifax;" Transformation, by Nathaniel Hawthorne; The Grey Woman and other Tales, by Mrs. Gaskell (Smith, Elder, and Co.); Beowulf, a Tale of the Captivity, by Mrs. Webb (Jackson, Walford, and Hodder), reputed from Old Merry's Annual; Little Wilson's, or Good Company, by the Author of "Dunnton Manor House" (Whibley and Co.); Tales from Shakspeare, by Charles and Mary Lamb; Illustrated Natural Scenes; Adventures of Mr. Merriwig; Tregenna's Trottin' Story Book (Griffith and Farren); Aurora; or, Rays of Light on the Road of Life, by W. Tebbs (Longman and Co.); Sunbeams, a toilet book of apophthegms and the like; Jephthah's Daughter, by Charles Swynnerton (Saunders, Otley, and Co.); Sunday Evening, a book for the author's "Sandi;" Autumn Leaves, by George Grey Jarvis (Charles Griffin and Co.), a volume of the same name published, and in review in the gallery of Mr. Graves, the prize publisher, Pall-mall; and as well worthy a visit, by the by, and, not merely because they gratify curiosity by showing the artist where most emphatically he is chez lui—in his atelier, as the learned Frenchmen say—but as the old Italians styled it (and not the modern affected word "studio," which we have derived from them), a bottega, that which in one case mean "workshop" and in the other simply "shop"—they are worthy of a visit, we say, not merely because they are the figured in the artist's studio, in more than the obvious sense, a truly picturesque phase of life, without finding it so disillusioned as to peep behind the scenes elsewhere, but because the personal interest in artists and their pursuits which such representations are calculated to awaken is help to further the study of art itself, and perhaps, still more to secure that social consideration for the artist which is even now wanting, in spite of the enlightened notions of society, and as regards which we British are still far behind some of our more refined neighbours. To persons who cannot understand the respect due to the aristocracy of genius and intellect we warmly commend a paper called "Studio Life," in the figured Scrittore of Mr. Thackeray's Miscellanies. These pictures by Mr. Ballantyne are, we are told, actually painted in the studio of the artist whose portrait they represent, and the report whispers that in one or two instances the portraits were painted by the artists themselves. The sketches, however, are not always left unfinished or finished lying about framed, have certainly, "in almost all cases, been painted upon Mr. Ballantyne's canvas, in the very room the studio is represented." We are sorry to say, however, that the portraits are in some instances the least interesting in the set of pictures. It is fair to add, however, that one is "unfinished," and more interesting are to be found in the figures of the painter's own artists, too, are, as in the case of Mr. Stanfield and some others, insignificant relatively to their vocation, and therefore accidentally a worse likeness than that of Mr. Frith. This popular painter is represented before a large blank canvas (Mr. Ballantyne's picture is not finished!) studying intently a model who is actually seated on the artist's "throne," while another model, a widow, is in waiting—a notable picture by intended as side by side with the two fine companions in the Royal marriage picture. One of the most interesting representations is that of Mr. Frith's studio, in which the picture of "The Death of Nelson," in the Royal Gallery of the Westminster Palace, towers (which the huge incongruous thing is, and has been so long (too long, Mr. Maclise) after its completion. The great mural painter is engaged at work on one of those vast and elaborate contrivances to roll along the raised platform. About him are the piece powder cartoons and loose pictures, scattered on the water-glass and in the foreground sits, grinding vermilion, "Fresco Mike," a civil, worthy fellow, introduced in a former picture (Mr. Maclise's picture), and who for some twenty years has assisted the Westminster painters in the preparation of their colours. Another very interesting picture is that representing Sir Edwin Landseer at work on the lions for Trafalgar-square. It is to be lamented that the artist

MR. S. W. BAKER, THE AFRICAN TRAVELLER.



THE very interesting narrative of his explorations of the upper course of the White Nile River, with the discovery of Lake Albert Nyanza, laid before the Royal Geographical Society by Mr. S. W. Baker, on the 13th ult., will have made our readers desirous of better personal acquaintance with that enterprising gentleman, whose name is worthy to be ranked with those of Captain Speke and Captain Grant as one of the boldest, ablest, and most successful travellers in this region of Central Africa. We have much pleasure, therefore, in giving his Portrait, with a few biographical particulars, which are, we believe, correct. Mr. Baker is forty-four years of age, and is the eldest son of the late Samuel Baker, Esq., of Thonegrove, in the county of Worcester, at one time High Sheriff of that county, and of Lypiatt Park, in Gloucestershire. He has, notwithstanding these social advantages of birth and fortune at home, spent the greater part of his life in wild countries of Asia and Africa, impelled by "the spirit of wandering" and by a delight in the adventurous sport of the huntsman, who really deserves that name in the jungles of Ceylon, where Mr. Baker first pursued the elk, the bear, the elephant, and the tiger, proving his manly prowess by the aid of "The Rifle and Hound." A passage in his second book, "Eight Years' Wanderings," published in 1855, expresses most characteristically the eminent with which, having returned to England from his first visit to Ceylon, in 1849, he pined for the life of free and healthy activity, enabled sometimes by glorious danger, to which he had become addicted from a twelvemonth's experience of its peculiar pleasures. "I discovered," he says, "that my trip to Ceylon had only served to upset all ideas of settling quietly at home. Scenes of former sports and places were continually intruding themselves upon my thoughts, and I longed to be once more roaming at large with the rifle through the noiseless wildernesses in Ceylon. So delightful were the recollections of past incidents that I could scarcely believe it lay within my power to renew them. Ruminating over all that had happened during the past year, I conjured up scenes to my memory which seemed too attractive to have existed in reality. I wandered along the London streets, compating their noise and bustle with the deep solitudes of Ceylon, and I felt like the sickly plants in a London parterre. I wanted the change to my former life. I constantly found myself gazing into gunsmiths' shops, and those I sometimes entered, abstractedly, to examine some rifles exposed in the window; and often have I passed an hour in boring the unfortunate gunmakers with my suggestions for various improvements in rifles and guns, which, as I was not a purchaser, must have been extremely edifying." This pleasant confession of his "gipsy-like love of wandering and complete independence" must be received with a grain of allowance; for, during his second residence in Ceylon, Mr. Baker seems to have occupied himself not exclusively with the chase of wild animals and the seeing of strange sights, which are so graphically related in his volumes, but to have seriously undertaken, with his brother, now Colonel Baker, the organisation of a rather extensive agricultural settlement at Nuwera Ellia, a neglected station in the rabbitoise mountain district, above a hundred miles from Colombo, still within easy reach of great abundance of the mightiest game. Referring, however, to the book already quoted for an extremely readable description of his further experiences in Ceylon, we must observe that Mr. Baker commenced, in 1861, preparing his African expedition, in the hope of meeting Speke and Grant at the sources of the Nile. He employed the first year in exploring the tributaries of the Athara, and afterwards proceeded to Khartoum, to organise his party for the great White Nile. In December, 1862, he started from Khartoum with a powerful force, embarked on board three vessels, and including twenty-nine animals of transport—camels, horses, and asses. Pursuing his course, he entered upon a dreary waste of water and reedy banks, where he soon lost his only European attendant, who was killed by fever. The remainder of the party safely reached Gondokoro, where they were joined by Speke and Grant. Upon this occasion Mr. Baker was told by Captain Speke that he was assured by the natives that a large lake existed to the westward, which he believed would be found to be a second source of the Nile, and that he himself had traced the river up to 2 deg. 20 min. N., when it diverged to the west, and he was obliged to leave it. Accordingly Mr. Baker then undertook to follow up the stream, and made his arrangements to join a trading party going southward, but they started without him. The trade along the White Nile really consisted of cattle-stealing, slave-catching, and murder, and the men whom he was obliged to engage at Khartoum were the vilest characters. He could only induce seventeen of them to go with him to the eastward, as none would go to the south; but, finding that they meant to desert him, he went on, with Mrs. Baker (who now accompanied him), and overtook the traders, arriving in the Latooka country, 110 miles east of Gondokoro, on the 14th of March. After sojourning in this country for a time, Mr. and Mrs. Baker, with their train of followers, travelling usually on the backs of oxen, made their way to Kamrasi's country, an elevated region between the Sobat and White Nile rivers; thence descending into the valley of the Asua, which Captain Burton had supposed to be the main stream of the White Nile. On the eighteenth day after leaving Kamrasi, still tracking the river upwards, they came in sight of the looked-for lake, a limitless sheet of blue water sunk low in a vast depression of the country. He descended the steep cliffs, 1500 ft. in height, leading Mrs. Baker by the hand, and, reaching the clean sandy beach, drank of the sweet waters. The western shore, sixty miles distant, consisted of ranges of mountains, 7000 ft. in height. Upon achieving the object of their journeys, Mr. Baker named the lake, subject to her Majesty's permission, Albert Nyanza. That lake, together with that of Victoria Nyanza, may be accepted as the great reservoirs of the Nile.

We shall give some very interesting Illustrations in a future Number, from the sketches which Mr. Baker has kindly lent us, of the scenery and costumes of the different tribes through which he passed. The Engraving on the preceding page represents the chief of the Obbo country, by name Kachoba, a powerful conjurer and rainmaker, and so grand a patriarch that he boasts as many as a hundred and sixteen children now living. When he takes a journey he rides on we see. The collection of various weapons and implements, given above, are also worthy of notice.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

A HALF-MILE match between Saxon Beauty and a most appropriately-named filly Finale, brought the racing season of 1865 to a close, with Finale as the last name of all, though they did bet 7 to 1 on her. There were some interesting points in the meeting, which can hardly be reversed of Shrewsbury. The ring did not think Sister to Drake such a good thing as they did in London, and dived to their sorrow with Pearl Diver, forgetful of the mare's Cambridgeshire place and her ridiculous weight. Mr. Heathcote continued the same quiet run of luck which the utaumn brought him; the high-priced Flyfisher did something for his owner at last; and L'Africaine proved, by walking in forty lengths ahead of everything in the steeplechase, what was said of him last spring, that such a horse for looks and action had not been seen for many a year. Like Chanticleer, Malton, and some others, he has a great dislike to a bee ever since he injured himself in one, and hence he was walked from Wales to Warwick, and thence on his conquering career to Croydon. "L'Africaine" in the Royal English Opera and L'Africain and Flyfisher in the steeplechase fields seem all the rage just now, and the latter are as paying a pair as Bourbon and The Trout eleven years ago.

Lord Glasgow has left his twenty-fourth trainer since Croft, and his horses are now at his jockey, John Osborne's, who will most probably keep and train them till his boor arrives. His Lordship has published a document to the effect that one John Dawkins, groom, takes his affidavit that General Peel's throat was rubbed with a mustard-and-vinegar blister between Epsom and Ascot, and that he had a cough-ball as well. The inference intended to be drawn seems to be this—that the horse had a slight cold, and that his Lordship was not told of it; but, as he came to the Cup post in magnificent condition, and ran by far the best race he ever did in his life, there seems to have been nothing to tell worth telling. At all events, the world don't care to be troubled about owners' and trainers' quarrels, and only consider the present case as an additional proof, if one were wanted, of John Scott's skill as a trainer. May his Lordship ever find a better or a trainer!

The turf statisticians are out sooner than ever this year, thanks to the monthly publication of Weatherby's Book-Calendar, which is the keystone of all their arithmetic. The Count de Lagrange heads the winnings, with £21,905; and the Duke of Beaufort is second, with £16,544. Each of these noblemen has had ten winners. Lord Stamford is third, with thirteen winners and £11,993; and therefore his Lordship's recent change of trainer has created surprise. Mr. Merry runs a fine fourth, with £8940; and, although Lord Portsmouth has only had two winners (Robin Hood and Sydmonton), his name stands seventh, with £6000. Mr. Chaplin is twelfth, and £5220 are the fruits of his maiden season. Lord Glasgow has only had two winners, of £2200; and Lord Falmouth only one, of £490. Lord Lyon, Gladiateur, and Ely each head their respective lists, three, and four year-old divisions; and Stanton has done best among the aged ones. Stockwell has a very strong lead on the sire list, thirty-seven winners, eighty-six prizes, and £33,219!; and no less than ten substitutions are already taken to him for 1867. Newminster is third on the list, with forty-five winners of 101 prizes, but of not quite half the Stock well amount.

The hunting men have everywhere been complaining of the wet and windy weather, which has made out work with scent, and in some instances driven the packs home quite early in the afternoon. Foxes have also been difficult to find, in consequence of the rough bad nights. Still, there have been some very good things where the scent has held. The Brocklesby began with a very fast forty minutes, and pulled their fox down in the open. Their hardest day, so far, has been on the 19th ult., when, with a good holding scent, they killed a brace, after running over a great extent of country. The Queen have had some very nice sport, and killed their foxes; but some of the best runs, owing to breaking, have been "rings." They had one of this description on the 17th, from Thorpe Trussells, when Earl Wilton joined them, for the first time this season, and went in his old form. Custance, the jockey, was out that day, and well forward, as usual—one of Earl Wilton's horses. On Tuesday week they, curiously enough, killed their fox within sixty yards of the cross where old Will Head lay in his coffin. Unless "old old Tom Wingfield" is still alive, Will Head was the senior ex-huntsman of the day. He whipped in very early in the century to "Mr. Shawe," when he hunted the late Duke of Rutland's hounds, and held the Cheshire harge for some seasons between Will Gaff (who never used one, and only trusted to his voice) and the late Joe Maiden. He was also for some seasons at Donnington with that lamented sportsman the late Marquis of Hastings, and there his long term of life in the stable closed.

One of the best days with the Milton was Guy Fawkes's day, 5th. 50m., of which was spent in killing a capital old fox from Mariner's Gorse. On Saturday week they had ten miles' cold hunting and gave him up; then the scent improved, and, in a 1h. 20m. with their second fox, the hounds went right away from the field.

The metropolitan clubs held a nice champion meeting in the Home Park, and if hunting there with beagles (which is said by the coursers to have been practised without liberty from the Master of the Horse) has thinned the number of the hares, it has made the rest run much more stoutly. The Darvels or Derwents seemed to be winning or running up for or dividing nearly everything. "Stonehenge" speaks of one winner, Longrange by David from Sophia, as "uniting the speed of his dam with the cleverness of his sire," and puts down Gaudy Pol as worth looking after for the Waterloo Cup, for which they are now taking 25 to 1 about Mr. Knowles's entry (doubtless King Tom, the runner up of this year, or Kitty Malone), and the same about Mr. Spinks's and Mr. Haywood's. Reveller 2nd was drawn after two courses with Councillor in the Weston Cup at West Herefordshire meeting, which was divided by two brothers, Eyes Right and Eyes Route, by Seagull—Chase Amie. Kitty Malone, a cheap sixty-guinea purchase, won the Scarisbrick Cup at the Second South Lancashire Open; and Miss Burleyson divided the Alderley Cup at Market Drayton. The running for the Amateur Challenge Club Cup was stopped before the first ties were run off, owing to the illness of the judge, Mr. Westropp. Lord Strathmore has sold his breed of greyhounds, and the twenty-four just averaged £7. One of these, Mock Turtle, an aged daughter of Justa and Mocking Bird, only made a guinea; and Magistrate, a son of Judge and Mavis (a daughter of Mocking Bird), only half a guinea more.

THE FARM.

THE Privy Council have issued an amended order, based, in a measure, on some of the recent recommendations of the Commissioners. Under it, the inspector has power to enter any places where he may suspect that beasts are ill of the plague, and cause them to be cleaned and disinfected, and see that the infected beasts are kept separate, and not in fields where they are likely to propagate the disease. The power of the inspector to seize and destroy is now confined to the single case of disobedience to his orders as regards separating diseased and healthy animals. Quarantine stables seem left at large; and it is, perhaps, well they are, as we hear from Glasgow of an instance where an inspector ordered the packing off a cow which was being doctored according to Major Graham's remedy, but met with a peremptory refusal; and, in spite of his denunciation of "empyrics," the cow got well. The great majority of farmers give themselves no chance. We read over and over again that they observe their beasts are ill, but leave them, perhaps, in the fields for a couple of days more, and then send for the inspector or try remedies, when they are in a stage from which no nursing can bring them round. Many of the veterinary profession are excessively chagrined about this new Order in Council, and one of their organs has the effrontery to complain that the Commission did not trust to veterinarians of skill, instead of non-professional persons like Messrs. Gibbett and Swan, the largest and most experienced cattle-salesmen in England and Scotland. The truth is that no less than sixteen veterinary surgeons were called, and six doctors, so that the medical part of the question must have been most fully gone into.

The homœopathists, who take their stand on the Holland remedies, have formed a society; but they complain that they have had no fair trial in Norfolk, and that the inspectors were their opponents as well as their judges, and would only register cows in a very advanced stage as fit subjects to be treated by them. However, the alarmists of the polsaic clause will smooth their way considerably, and professional jealousy can no longer have such free scope. Mr. Forrester, who superintended the trial, stated to the Norfolk Association that the homœopathic treatment of animals after they had passed the first stage had resulted in failure. Lord Berry, on the other hand, argued that the trial was not conclusive, and £50 has been voted towards another. It is as idle to expect that an homœopath will have much chance if allopaths are to dictate his cases, as that a Clydesdale would win a champion prize in a Suffolk showyard, or vice versâ. Mr. Duckham, the editor of the Hereford Herd Book, gives his testimony as to the success of homœopathy in Herefordshire when other remedies failed.

One new rule touches the wilful infection case which we spoke of last week, and no animal may now be sent to any fair, or driven along any road, or shipped on any railway, truck, or steamer, or put on any common or uninclosed land, if it is labouring under the disorder, or has been in the same shed or stable, herd or flock, with one suffering under it. Every beast that is sent to the Metropolitan Cattle Market and is not sold is to be marked with the tail slaughter-mark, as a notice where it has been. On the whole, the Council seem to have exercised their powers very promptly and with considerable tact. Amid all this trouble, the Mark-lane averages have risen. Wheat is 8s. 2d. higher than it was this time last year; barley, 2s. 6d.; and oats, 2s. 10d.; and the London average for wheat is only 8d. short of 50s.

Farmers hardly know or think about the fine shows; but still Northamptonshire considers that it has got a "gold medal ox" in its stalls quite as good as Mr. Manning's was. Captain Gunter's herd has been strengthened by a rich roan heifer by Second Duke of Wharfdale from Duchess 86th, a daughter of the roan twin, and one of the very best in the herd. Duchess 77th was unfortunate this summer, and both the twins and old Duchess 70th have been dead some time. The roan twin fell two years before behind, and the white only a Fourth Duke of Oxford bull, which is at present at Lord Braybrooke's. The Second Duke of Wharfdale and Duke of Wetherby (by Second Duke of York from Duchess 77th) are at Wetherby, and so is Third Duke of Wharfdale from Duchess 86th, the last calf of Duchess 70th).

Mr. Carr sells the late Dr. Dickenson's herd on the 22nd inst. The enthusiastic Doctor began in 1847 with Mr. R. W. Ashburnham's sale, and was especially partial to Cumberland pedigrees. He then went on with Cartwright's Nonpareil tribe and the Mirandas, one of which calved Young Ben. Lancet (11,681), his first good bull, was of the Nonpareil sort, and won five first prizes at the local shows, where the Doctor was very fond of exhibiting. The Crusade, the Bat wing (a branch of the Barmpton Rose), the Bracelets from Mr. Mitchell of Cheadle, and with a good deal of Booth in them, were his great tribes. In 1853 he bought his bull Florian (58 gs.) at Earl Dudley's sale; to him succeeded Hogarth (13,036) from Colonel Towneley's, and lately he used Mr. Peel's Cordle by Elfin King from Mr. Bolden's Bride. He always insisted on milking properties, and a more devoted lover of the "red, white, and roan" never pored over Strafford's Herd Book.

We hear of the loss of a very valuable shorthorn calf and the serious illness of another, but not from the plague, which does not seem to have had any effect on Mr. Newberry's sale of Devons, as in-calf heifers went as high as 40 gs., and a choice bull-calf made 50 gs. Mr. Baldwin's Miss Hastings 2nd, which has taken three Royal firsts in succession, and was only three years old on July 19, has just had a fine heifer-calf, by Batterses. This in her second calf, and both she and Batterses have been in training ever since they were calved.

The Birmingham Fat Show opens on Monday. The entries of cattle are 135, of sheep 90 (a very great increase on previous shows), and of pigs 71. The pens of poultry and pigeons number 1676 and 331 respectively. The Dog Show has 800 entries; and pens of grey hound, pointer, setter, retriever, and spaniel puppies will be a new feature of it.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS.

VISCOUNT DILLON.

Viscount Dillon died, at his seat, Ditchley Park, Enstone, Oxfordshire, on the 18th ult. He had been out with hounding a few days before, and was attacked by an attack of paralysis, from which he never recovered. He was the eighth Right Hon. Charles Henry Dillon Lee, fourteenth Viscount Dillon, and Baron Dillon of Costello Gallen, in the County of Sligo, in the Peerage of Ireland, was the son of Henry Augustus Dillon Lee, M.P. for Oxfordshire, by Harriet, eldest daughter of Dominick Geoffrey Browne, Esq., and sister of Dominick, fifteenth Viscount Kenmare. He was born April 20, 1810, and succeeded to the viscountcy, on the death of his father, July 24, 1852. He was High Sheriff of Oxfordshire in 1857. He married, Feb. 1, 1843, Lydia Sophia, daughter of the late Philip Laycock Story, Esq., and by her, who survives him, he leaves two daughters, the Hon. Blanche Florence and the Hon. Constance Frances, the wife of Charles Augustus Drake Halford, Esq. The Viscount was brother of Lady Sunday of Aldebury, the Hon. Mrs. Dillon Lee, Mrs. Spencer Fonnereau, and the Hon. Mrs. Gerald Kemp Story. The Viscount is succeeded in the title by his cousin, the Rev. Edward Dillon Lee, son of Viscount Dillon, who was born on the 6th of April, 1851, and married, in 1886, Sarah Augusta, daughter of the late Alexander Hanna, Esq. The third brother, the Hon. Arthur Edward Denis Dillon-Lee, became viscountess by the title. The family of Dillon, one of the most ancient, historic, and distinguished in the peerage of Ireland, was founded in that kingdom by Sir Henry Dillon (secretary of France, afterwards King, John); Sir Henry became Lord of Drumrany, and was ancestor of the Viscounts Dillon and the Earls of Roscommon, as well as of the present Augusta-Henri, Comte Dillon, President de Mesa, only son of the late Theodore, Count Dillon, Commander in Camp in the service of France (who died in 1819), by his wife, Henriette, Baroness de Lovay, and was descended of the Viscount Dillon who was Sir Theobald Dillon, being so created on the 16th of March, 1622. Sir Theobald was Governor of Athlone, and died in 1641, in the early fortunes of James, and was succeeded in France by his son Arthur, a Lieutenant-General and Governor of Toulon. One of his sons was Colonel of Dillon's regiment, at the head of which he fought victoriously for France, at the battle of Fontenoy; and another son was Archbishop of Narbonne, and president of the States of Languedoc. Many civil, clerical, and military, of the Dillons rose high in France. The famous Dillon Regiment had for centuries a Colonel of their name and race on every occasion, sooner than break through the rule, Louis XV. sent to Ireland for a member of the family to take the colonelcy. Dillon's regiment was famous in the Revolution, and its last Colonel, the Hon. Arthur Dillon, was guillotined in Paris in 1794, and Lally-Tollendal, who was also of the race of Dillon, "a celebrated Irish family," was banished from the country, "for having been too good a friend to the people." Lallyman, Madame, he called, "a name the Colonel's reply, as it frequently occurred with her request. A matrimonial alliance with the noble house of Lee, Earls of Lichfield (whose surname they adopted), and the complete restoration of their title by the Irish Peerage Act of 1778, re-established the Viscount Dillon in England and Ireland; but many branches of the Irish Counts Dillon were mentioned, are still settled and of note in various parts of the Continent.

COLONEL J. GLENCAIRN BURNS.

Robert Burns, the poet, during his life of penury and care, found but few to patronise or help him, and among those few none more true to him than the noble house of Glencairn. His great friend, the fourteenth Earl of Glencairn; and when the Earl died, Jan. 30, 1791, Burns immortalised his name in a magnificent "Lament," of which the following is the opening stanza figure with similar comparisons by the best of the classic bards of Greece and Rome. The Rev. Alexander Dalziel, Glencairn's chaplain, and friend of the mother, were also kind to Burns, and, as a compliment both to the dead and to the living, the poet, in 1791, named a son after each of the sons of the children whom he lived to witness, for their sakes, to write the lines at his funeral. This James Glencairn Burns was the Lieutenant-Colonel Burns of the Bengal Infantry, who, honoured and loved by all who knew him, died on the 18th ult., at Cheltenham, from the effects of an agidents. He was the third in succession of the sons of Robert Burns. The first, Major Armour, of Manchine, the "Bonnie Jean" of his verse. James Glencairn Burns entered, early in life, a commercial house in the East Company's service, and to there rose to a distinguished position. After a career of honour in India, he became a Lieutenant-Colonel in 1857, and, on return to Scotland, some twenty years ago, he was received with great cordiality, and presented with the freedom of the city of Edinburgh. Colonel Burns was a hunting squire, and took a brother sporting the neighbourhood, and now last surviving brother, Colonel William Nicol Burns, of the Madras Infantry. James Glencairn Burns was the 1839 married to a daughter of squeezer, with a countenance very like the poet's. In that year, 1839, he emerged from his privacy and took part in the famous Eglinton tournament, speaking, and being received with unbounded enthusiasm, at Edinburgh, Glasgow, Dundee, Dumfries, and other Scottish towns. Colonel Burns "humbly thanked his God that He had spared him to see that glorious day." Mr. Tytler, in proposing his health, spoke of his "noble and manly bearing, and also of his fine geniality of disposition, his kindly warmth of heart, his overflowing sympathy with whatever encouraged the good, and his wholly strongly characterised his illustrious father. "It would," continued Mr. Tytler, "be a matter of regret to all who knew the poet's life, if the honoured guest and his brother spending the remainder of their days passed honourably in an honourable profession, in each other's society, engaged in the same pursuits, devoted to each other by a love so strong as only to be transcended by their love for their father." Lieutenant-Colonel Burns married, then as his second wife, Jessie, daughter of Captain William Nicol; his daughter, Mrs. Hutchison, and two children in Australia; and another daughter, Mrs. Bowden, in Edinburgh, with her husband. The next brother Robert (who died in 1857), Mrs. Everett, and her daughter in Belfast. It is remarkable that the earliest of the brothers of Colonel Burns to die was Sir Robert Burns himself. The death, without issue, of John, the last Burt, seems to have left the male surname after that of Robert Burns extinct, but Colonel Burns's daughter, Mrs. Hutchison, has a son, Robert Burns Hutchison, and Mrs. Everett has a son, Robert Burns Everett, and Mrs. Bowden has a son, Robert Burns Bowden, and a daughter, Jessie Burns Bowden, who are descendants of Glencairn Burns, the poet's power, far greater than the patent of nobility, has given it a vitality which will not perish.

T. J. PETTIGREW, ESQ.

Thomas Joseph Pettigrew, Esq., F.R.S., F.S.A., a distinguished archæologist, who died on the 17th ult., at his house, 7, Montpelier Square, Brompton, as the age of seventy-four, was by profession a surgeon, and had carried on considerable practice; a medical practice; and was for many years consulting surgeon to the Chelsea Hospital for Women. He was also a Fellow of the Royal Archæological Association, in whose deliberations he took a prominent part, and was one of the founders of the Archæological Institute, holding successive offices in England, which that Association, and with many kindred societies in different parts of Europe. His publications are very numerous; but the one by which he will be best known is the "Bibliotheca Sussexiana." Mr. Pettigrew's high character, intellectual and agreeable manners, and benevolent disposition had won for him a host of friends and admirers.

MR. LOVELL REEVE.

Lovell Augustus Reeve, Esq., F.L.S., F.G.S., whose lamented death has just occurred, was born in 1814, and had been for many years the head of Lovell Reeve, and Co., of Henrietta-street, publishers of a vast number of standard and valuable works in natural history, conchology, botany, and antiquities. From 1856 to 1858, or thereabouts, Mr. Reeve was editor of the Literary Gazette. His chief study, however, was conchology, his profound knowledge of which was shown by his various elaborate and costly works on it subject.

Yesterday week the Commissioners of her Majesty's Works and Public Buildings effected the purchase of the land required for the contemplated enlargement of the National Gallery, situated on the north side of Trafalgar square, bounded by Hemming's-row on the north, by St. Martin's place on the east, by Castle-court on the south, and by Castle-court on the west. The purchases include St. Martin's Workhouse, with Archbishop Tenison's Grammar School; and the sum the parish of St. Martin's is to receive for the concession is £80,000.

CHESS.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THAT.—In No. 1 (Black to move) Black has his force better developed; in No. 2 (White to move), as Black is about a Queen and has no compensating advantage whatever, "Who is the better player?" is a question which needs no answer.

W. F. FERRIS.—The accepted position shall be examined. 2. We have no authority to do so, supposing we know. The parties have, doubtless, good reason for preserving their incognito, but it is, perhaps, hardly fair to the public to play what they refuse to publish.

White to play, and mate in five moves.

CHESS IN BATH.

An instructive Game between Messrs. HAROLD and PIERPOINT.

(Evans's Gambit).

1. P to K 4th	P to K 4th	16. Q takes Kt	B takes Kt

3. B to Q B 4th	B to Q B 4th	18. Kt to K 2nd
4. P to Q Kt 4th	B takes P	(At to Q with would have been more effective, we believe.)
5. P to Q 4th	P to Q 3rd		Kt to K B 4th
6. P takes P	B to Q Kt 3rd	(Very well executed; the sacrifice of a Pawn is of little moment compared with bringing the Rook into action.)
7. Q to Kt 3rd	Kt to K 2nd	19. Kt takes B	P takes Kt
8. P to K 5th	Kt takes P	20. B takes P	Q to K 2nd

	Kt takes B		K to Q 2nd
(We prefer playing 16. P for B 5th, White would then have a good game, and if Black takes the Pawn with Kt, White can play P to Q 5th. For a good example of this variation, see Game 1 in the 2nd vol. of Staunton's Chess Amusements.)		22. P takes R	R takes P (ch)

The accuracy of White's move all through this opening is something, we apprehend, unique in the annals of chess, and a last battle piece runs of great.

After this very simple but very conclusive stroke of play, Black surrenders.

AMERICAN CHESS GOSSIP.—Mr. Morphy is still in New York, but, it is said, will shortly leave for Europe, and, after some stay in France, will probably take up his permanent abode in London.—A match at chess by telegraph between Mr. Mackenzie, of Cincinnati, and Mr. Delmar, a new resident in New York, and Mr. Frederic Perrin, of Brooklyn. Mr. McKenzie wagers one hundred dollars on the result of the game, the best, which is to be determined by the winning of the first seven games. The match commenced on the 1st inst.—Mr. Steinitz has considerable interest among chess-players.—Philadelphia Daily Evening Bulletin.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

No. 1346.—VOL. XLVII. SATURDAY, DECEMBER 9, 1865. WITH A SUPPLEMENT, FIVEPENCE

THE FENIAN TRIALS.

THE conviction of Thomas Clarke Luby of the offence of conspiring to overthrow the sovereignty of the Queen in Ireland by force of arms and of replacing it by a Republican Government, and the heavy sentence passed upon him by the Court, will probably give a mournful satisfaction to a large majority of even his own countrymen. It is sad, inexpressibly sad, to witness a doom of civil degradation carried into effect upon a man who has been so reared as to make it worse than death to him, and to know that one of gentle blood, of conspicuous gifts, of high intellectual culture, and of all the social sensibilities and ties which such advantages imply, will henceforth be ranked with felons, and day by day endure the ignominy of sharing their lot. The utter desolation and wretchedness of such a fate in such a case can only be contemplated with bleeding hearts by those whose springs of pity are not dried up. Nevertheless, it is a satisfaction to find that the law is strong enough to protect society from the much more abundant misery which must inevitably have resulted from the practical development of the designs to which Luby and his fellow-conspirators had deliberately committed themselves. Without holding them guilty of the sanguinary intentions suggested in O'Keefe's letter, it is hardly too much to take for granted that the desperate counsels it brought under their notice must have opened their eyes to the possible extremities to which insurrection, once excited, might be carried by the lowermost of its forces, and the hearty laugh with which it was received by Luby and his wife only shows how singularly unreflective must have been their habit of mind in laying the train which they meant to have exploded in civil war.

In truth, the entire conspiracy, as disclosed by the evidence, brings before us a somewhat novel phase of human nature, and one the philosophy of which has yet to be explained. What has been the impelling motive of Fenianism? What was the glitter in its promises which could have dazzled such a mind as Luby's? We see in it an association of what appears on the surface to be self-sacrificing patriotism, of generous instincts, of capacities far from contemptible, and of indomitable energy, with a project as worthless in itself as to every rational mind it must have seemed wild and impracticable. How are we to explain the combination consistently with the known laws by which human nature is ordinarily regulated? It is said that there are three hundred thousand Fenians in America and Ireland: to what is their peculiar susceptibility to the virus of rebellion to be ascribed? Not to race; for Fenianism disclaims all differences arising from blood. Not to nationality; for the Irish people, as a whole, repudiate the "brotherhood." Not to misgovernment and oppression; for, whatever may have been the case in days gone by, Ireland has, for many years past, enjoyed all the Constitutional rights which belong to England, and she can point to no wrong inflicted on her by law which she might not, if she pleased, get redressed by legal methods. Not even to religion; for Fenianism is no cathedral of religious animosity. What, then, is the explanation of this phenomenon? It is difficult to give any satisfactory account of it. May it not be a vague echo of the past, deriving its own meaning and emphasis from the past alone? An outbreak of traditional irritation? The reappearance of dim recollections in the form of revenge? The revival, by the American Civil War, of hopes and aspirations, of motives and passions, of restless impulses and shadowy dreams, which had all but passed away, and which, as invisible ink by the agency of heat, have been brought out once more by the tremendous excitement which has recently convulsed the United States? If so, we may suspect, it will soon disappear; but not less incumbent was it on the Government of Ireland to grapple firmly with the nascent mischief as soon as it became fairly tangible.

We rejoice that the danger—so far as there was an element of danger in the conspiracy—has been met with calmness as well as determination. The Irish Government, we think, is to be congratulated on the manner in which it has dealt with the incipient revolution. When it first began to act, it was hampered as for attacking too much importance to a ridiculous plot. It is now blamed for having allowed it time to develop its features. Its best justification is that it has saved Ireland from confusion, and has convicted the ringleaders of rebellion, without having had recourse to any exceptional means. Without exciting more than a momentary alarm, without using any of its powers to excess, without resort to military force, without betraying for an instant the slightest tendency to vindictiveness, it has crushed in the bud what might have grown to be a troublesome insurrection. No blood has been shed, but crime has been brought home to the guilty, and justice has been administered in a considerate and merciful manner. From the first apprehension of the culprits to their conviction the law officers of the Crown have given every facility to the accused for conducting their defence; and in presiding over their trials the Judges have become almost counsel for unprofessional means. Without exciting more than a momentary alarm, without using any of its powers to excess, without resort to military force, without betraying for an instant the slightest tendency to vindictiveness, it has crushed in the bud what might have grown to be a troublesome insurrection. No blood has been shed, but crime has been brought home to the guilty, and justice has been administered in a considerate and merciful manner. From the first apprehension of the culprits to their conviction the law officers of the Crown have given every facility to the accused for conducting their defence; and in presiding over their trials the Judges have become almost counsel for unprofessional means. Seldom, indeed, have State prosecutions been so entirely free from even a shadow of indecorum. Possibly, the severity of the sentence passed upon Luby may have excited surprise in some quarters; but even in this respect, we think, the bounds of moderation have not been overstepped.

That we may be fully impressed with this conviction we must turn our thoughts for a moment from the punishment to be endured to the crime which it was intended to repress. It has been said that history contains no record of a successful rebellion, for rebellion, when successful, is changed into patriotism. There is a grain of solid truth underneath this surface of glittering wit. The lesson that it teaches, however, is a weighty one; and, if duly pondered, will be found to condemn armed insurrection, except as a last effort to relieve one's country from an intolerable pressure of tyranny and degradation. Circumstances may be conceived in which it would be a man's duty to bear a flaming brand through the chambers of a powder-magazine, but to do so in bravado, or for the attainment of any object short of paramount necessity, would be an offence only for the severest penalty known. To attempt to overturn the settled order of Government by recourse to violence involves issues which none can control, but which are sure of being attended by fearful calamities. Take the case of Fenianism. If the plans of the conspirators had succeeded into action, Ireland would have become, for however short a time, the theatre of civil war. What does that imply, or rather, what in the form of human suffering does it not imply? It needs but a short stretch of imagination to what has recently passed on the other side of the Atlantic. What imagination can calculate the sum total of agony, bodily and mental, occasioned by that transatlantic horrible? Now, it was to be the possibility of such a catastrophe that the Fenian conspirators deliberately took steps to expose their country. And for what? To substitute for the free institutions of that country a republic on the model of America and to separate Ireland from her connection with England. Could it have been accomplished—what then? Would the success have repaid the terrible cost at which it must have been purchased? But, comparing the means within reach of the conspirators with the means at the command of Great Britain, was there even a remote chance of success? Why, their very country repudiated them and their designs. An insurrection without adequate motive, without the narrowest ground of hope, denied even the good wishes of the people it was professedly planned to serve, sure to be prolific of evil both to the innocent and the guilty, and without promise of even a semblance of good, ought not to be confounded with patriotism. It is a measureless crime, and calls aloud for signal punishment.

We would fain hope that the dignified bearing of the Irish Government in the face of this provocation will somewhat abate the pretensions of the Fenians across the water, if it do not put a stop to their designs. At any rate, it may teach Irishmen in Ireland to contrast the conduct of those who, from a safe distance, would thrust them into the flames of civil discord with that of the authorities who seek to protect them from so dire an evil. And when this specific has been administered, as it is forgotten, as we trust it soon will be, and its ringleaders are expiating their crime in penal servitude, we are confident that England will be forward to show her sister nation, who refused to be wiled away into disloyalty, or to enter into even a momentary communion with treason, that she has no reason to regret her steadfastness. Her affairs will be taken in hand with a resolute determination to sift from them everything which emanates even remotely from treason, and to deal with it as her sensitive spirit will be as far as possible soothed; and Fenianism, though it meant it not, will have the effect of weaving new ties between the two islands, and in uniting their respective populations in a real and permanent "brotherhood."

THE CONFLICT OF H.M.S. BULLDOG WITH THE FORTS AND GUN-BOATS AT CAPE HAYTIEN.

THE West Indies and Mexico are a never-ceasing account of the affair on the coast of Hayti, or St. Domingo, at a place called Cape Haytien, on the north side of that island, where the British steam-sloop Bulldog, carrying six guns, under the command of Captain Archer Wake, got into a dispute with the negro chief Salnave, the head of the insurrectionary faction in the Republic of Hayti; and on the 23rd of October, had a regular battle with the forts and flotilla of gun-boats by which Salnave has recently made the chief attempts to the forts and sinking two of the enemy's vessels, the Bulldog accidentally got aground, and was battered and abandoned by Captain Wake, to prevent her becoming their prey. Three of our men were killed, and six were wounded in the fight. Respecting the origin of the dispute, it appears that the British Consul at Cape Haytien, Mr. Dutton, had taken in his house a few British refugees, and that Salnave had desired Mr. Dutton to give up these people, which he refused, whereupon the house was entered by force, and the poor fellows under his protection were dragged out and carried away on the seashore. The followers of Salnave then commenced to wreak their vengeance on Mr. Dutton's property; they smashed his furniture, took everything they could lay their hands on; pulled down the flag-staff, dragged the flag on shore, and had the insolence to fire a volley on board the Bulldog (which was lying off the Cape at the time) and haul the gunboat before Salnave's house, in order that he could Salnave what he meant. The reply was a mere burst of vulgar insolence. Mr. Dutton then returned with the ensign, and sent a letter demanding full and ample satisfaction in twenty-four hours. Next morning the Bulldog was seen steaming into the harbour, and, on passing Fort Picolo, was fired upon. Captain Wake answered this fire with a broadside, dismantled all the guns on that fort, and passed on to engage with another fort. At last, and sent a shell into the arsenal, blowing it up. The Voltigeur, a vessel which had been taken by the rebels, had the impudence to fire at the Bulldog. One shot, in return, was quite enough to settle her; after receiving it, she struck her flag, and was towed away to be about fifteen fathoms. A schooner, armed by Salnave, came to the rescue of the Voltigeur. It is needless to say that she met with the same fate. The worst, however, is yet to be told. The poor Bulldog, after having fought for about two hours, ran aground, and, in spite of numerous reefs about Cape Haytien, immediately, the enemy on shore took advantage of her position and brought all their batteries to bear. The Bulldog kept up a fire as long as gunpowder; she finished, he thought it necessary to set fire to and abandon his vessel. The officers and crew left the ship, and the H.B.M. steamer Assured, for Cape Haytien. The commander of the Galatea at once sent his message ashore, demanding that all the members of the revolutionary committee should surrender unconditionally on board that vessel. In case of refusal the Galatea and Lily, after a delay of twelve hours, would bombard the forts. The French consul brought the news from Cape Haytien left just three hours before the news had arrived.

The Illustration of the conflict of Oct. 23, engraved on our front page, is from a sketch by Dr. E. J. Moss, late of the Bulldog.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

PARIS, Thursday, Dec. 7.

THE decree which was issued some ten or twelve days since, promising a considerable amelioration in the financial position of the Luxembourg, has been energetically condemned by the entire Paris press, excepting, of course, those journals known to be in the interest of the Government. As time goes on the opposition increases in intensity. Petitions to the Emperor, praying that the decree may be recalled, are in course of signature by persons resident in the locality; and, should these fail of effect, the deputies for Paris have, it is said, determined to bring the question before the Chambers, on the ground that the decree is in itself illegal. The Parisians are so chary of their public gardens—the Londoners of their parks; and another scheme, which contemplates a continuation of the Rue Rambuteau—a beautiful street which leads from the Place Vendôme to the Rue de Rivoli—right through the gardens of the Tuileries to the Quai du Louvre, will be certain to encounter the strongest possible opposition. The beautifiers of Paris, in the eagerness to behave improperly, would destroy the very thing we have well alone.

The Prefet of the Seine, Baron Haussmann, has just presented his annual report on the progress made with what may be styled the reconstruction of Paris to the Emperor. From this document it appears that between Oct. 1, 1864, and Sept. 30, 1865, there have been erected in the city of Paris alone no less than 3351 new houses, giving 13,921 separate habitations. The total number of houses now amounts to no more than 1942. The Baron's budget for the ensuing year estimates the outlay for further improvements at upwards of twenty millions of francs, and fixes the expenditure at about the same amount. Another important improvement is that of the new year is to give birth may be mentioned the erection of lamps at the corner of every street and blind alley, and the placing upon them the names of the streets in bold white letters, so as to be easily read at nightfime.

Theatricals and "la Chasse" seem to be the only amusements at Compiègne. Among the later performances have been the comedies "An Printemps" and "Les Finidcens," by the actors of the Théâtre Français, who enjoy, it seems, the special privilege of entering the Imperial salon when the performances are over, and of paying their respects in person to the Emperor and Empress. Scale of the last upon his time engendered by these daily entertainments, the Empress, we are told, still finds an opportunity to spare a few minutes for the second volume of his "Life of Cæsar," which is to appear during the ensuing year. Among the guests at Compiègne during the past week were the English, Russian, and Prussian Ambassadors; the Duke of Magenta, M. Achille Fould, Minister of Finance; MM. Emile and Eugène Pereire, the great bankers; a tolerable sprinkling of literary men and artists, and Earl Dudley and his handsome bride. The Compiègne festivities will be brought to a close on the 14th of the present month, and a day or two after the Court will take up its residence at the Tuileries.

Prince Napoleon and Princess Clotilde have returned to Paris, and it is hinted that they will form part of the fourth series of guests invited to Compiègne to meet the young King and Queen of Portugal. The Ajaccio speech is to be considered as forgotten, a formal reconciliation is to take place, and the Prince is to be invited to resume his post as President of the Superior Commission for the Paris Universal Exhibition of 1867. Such is the on dit of the day.

Apropos of exhibitions, the "Exhibition of Art Applied to Works of Industry" closed on Friday last, and with it the interesting Loan Collection, or Retrospective Museum, as it became latterly the fashion to call it.

A good deal of finessing is going on at the present moment with reference to the person to be selected to fill the late M. Dupin's chair at the French Academy. One of the most eminent candidates here, it is said, offered M. Troplong to carry his election. M. Guizot suppose the candidature of Thiers, the historian. Jules Janin seems, I presume, that his chance is hopeless, has written to the austere Forty to say that he desists from again offering himself for their suffrages. M. Gérôme, the painter of the "Duel after the Masquerade" and the "Gladiators in the Circus," which figured in the "Exposition" a few years known in England—has been elected member of an academy of quite a different kind—namely, that of Geography of the Beaux-Arts.

The French papers state that an Italian collector (name not given, which is suspicious) has just returned from Egypt with one of the most interesting objects of antiquity ever brought to light, being nothing less than a statue of Polyphar's wife, with an inscription on the base proving its identity. It is the lady in question beyond a doubt. The face is said to be remarkably ugly.

Respecting the missing inscriptions on the famous Anachusian vase, of which I spoke last week, the following explanation has been given:—It seems that when the vase was originally discovered, a sketch of it was made and sent to Paris. On the same piece of paper the draughtsman had chanced to copy some ancient inscriptions, having no reference whatever to the vase in question, but which got inserted in an engraving of it which was directed to be made, and thus caused the mistake in question.

One of the most remarkable changes which are progressing in the social life of Paris is the spread of clubs—not of clubs as they were understood in the old time-honoured political times, but clubs copied from Pall-mall and Covent-garden. Not a week goes by every section of society does not have its club. The rich have a palace, the poor a flat. It is given out to be looked upon in the Society as the Temple of Harmony, or the Boulevard des Capucines. Let not English ladies think for one moment that the French have adopted the less fond of his wife than the English. Monsieur and his cercle—here is a theme of which Madame never tires. Monsieur has his club, Madame her "Conservatoire"—a newly-coined word—for Monsieur goes back to his club after dinner for cards or billiards. Madame goes back to the memory of the grandeur of Paris cluhe, the Duke of Orleans, who established one in the Palais Royal soon after the American War of Independence. Then followed the Americans' Club on the Boulevard des Arcades, and in the Palais Royal. The Freemasons had theirs, of course. Next in importance were the Jacobins' Club, and that of Rue Montorgueil, or Normandy, or Auvergne held their meetings. Then followed a host of little clubs—the Club de la Rue de Valois, the Théâtre Français, and cercles held in great houses. The Revolution of 1848 produced a crop of the strangest clubs, among which were the Blouses, and the Clubs. But when the political excitement was over, the clubs which exist now are like those of their predecessors of the time. Now the Parisian is a dandy and a sportsman, not a politician. If he be of the old nobility he will join Le Cercle, near the Rue Royale, Boulevard des Capucines, which the Duke de Guiche founded in 1828. It is splendidly located, opened on the Boulevard des Capucines, and one block hall in twelve excludes! It is an avowed institution of the Jockey Club, and is the Jockey Club of Paris. Another opposite is the sporting and gambling Jockey Club, where elegant just like may be seen eight days after passing Victoria, and where the arrangements are completely British. There is the Bucolic Club, and the railway itinerary, the Cosmopolitan, and the Chess. But what shows the railway clubbists are handsomely housed at the boulevard corner of the Rue Scribe. In the centre of the Place de la Concorde, shaded by the trees of the Champs Elysées, and with a pretty garden of its own, is the Cercle Impérial. It is a fine house, which stands apart, and is the nearest approach the Parisians have yet made to a Pall-mall club. But the bon fleuret of Paris have completely taken to the idea of luxurious clubs, and will do something very extravagant in this way shortly.

BELGIUM.

King Leopold lies dangerously ill. The Moniteur Belge of Thursday morning published the following bulletin, signed by the King's doctors:—

Weekness continues to be the prevailing symptom in his Majesty's condition. (Signed) WIDMUS.

SPAIN.

The health of the Queen continues to improve.

It is denied in Madrid that the Government has sent orders to suspend hostilities against Peru. It is affirmed that the Government is not disposed to accept the mediation of any neutral Power, but that warlike preparations are being made to carry on the war.

The elections have terminated. Of the successful candidates, thirty belong to the Moderados, four to the Progressistas, and twenty to the neo Catholics.

Reductions in the expenditure for the collection of the indirect taxes and for the administration of justice have been decided upon by the Government.

The post of Director-General of the Lotteries, with the staff attached thereto, is suppressed.

A public anti-slavery meeting is to be held, on the 10th inst., at Madrid. It is expected to be an important gathering. Senor Olozaga, the Parliamentary chief of the Liberal party, will preside.

ITALY.

On Wednesday evening the Chamber of Deputies elected Signor Rattazzi to the office of President by a majority of votes out of 278 sitting, after two ballots between Signori Mari and Mordini.

The process of scrutiny was long, because the Chamber is very nearly terminated.

At Naples, on the 2nd inst., there were fourteen cases of cholera and seven deaths; in the neighbouring communes sixteen cases and eight deaths.

SWEDEN.

Great excitement prevails at Stockholm consequent on the debate proceeding in the Chamber of Nobles on the reform of the Constitution. The bill has been adopted by the Chamber of Peasants and the Chamber of Burgesses, and the people are anxiously watching its progress in the Upper Chambers and holding assemblies in the streets.

A contrast with several German banks was signed last Saturday, at the office of the National Bank, Stockholm, for a loan of nine millions of thalers, for the construction of Swedish railways.

GREECE.

The Chamber has decided, by a majority of 96 votes, upon the revision of the articles of the Constitution relating to the Council of State. It has also abolished the Senate by a majority of one. The Prime Minister of the Interior has tendered his resignation. Consul Sponaros left last Saturday evening.

UNITED STATES.

Florida has abolished slavery, repudiated the Confederate debt, annulled the Secession ordinance, and provided for receiving the testimony of coloured persons. The Mississippi Assembly has also passed a bill permitting negro testimony in certain cases. The Governor of Alabama in his message to the Legislature urges the adoption of the Constitutional amendment abolishing slavery, and the passage of a clause for the protection of negroes.

The Governor of Louisiana has called a special Session of the Legislature to elect members for Congress.

A National Republican bid for the reorganisation of the South is to be presented to Congress.

Some prominent citizens of New York gave General Grant a grand reception, at the Fifth Avenue Hotel, on the 30th ult. Two thousand persons were present, including the naval and military official potentialities.

General Weitzel has superseded General Steel in the command in Texas.

Mr. Seward has forwarded to Mr. Adams a general acknowledgment of the numerous addresses which were sent from this country to the United States on the occasion of Mr. Lincoln's death. President Johnson, says Mr. Seward, has read the addresses "with profound emotions of sensibility and gratitude." Mr. Seward alludes delicately to his having been laid aside in consequence of the attack made upon him as the reason for these addresses not having been acknowledged separately and at an earlier date, and he trusts that the signers of those addresses will accept this general answer.

MEXICO.

The principal news from Mexico is that the Republicans have raised the siege of Matamoros in consequence of the Imperial forces marching from Monterey to attack their rear. The Juarez retreat the Republicans were sadly cut up by the Imperialists.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

The anniversary festival of the Scottish Hospital was held, on Thursday week, at the Freemasons' Tavern,—Dr. Norman Macleod in the chair. The amount collected for the institution was £2000.

The Duke of Northumberland has consented to quit his house at Charing-cross, as the Board of Works propose driving right through it as a street to the Thames Embankment.

Upwards of 200 of the supporters and friends of Mr. Hughes, the member for Lambeth, entertained their candidate at a supper given at the Bridge-house Hotel, on Monday evening. Mr. C. Buxton, M.P., presided.

A wedding took place, on Tuesday, in the Temple Church, where weddings had not been solemnised for the last hundred years, viz., the marriage of Miss Robinson, daughter of the Master of the Temple, with Mr. Hornby, of Liverpool.

The twelfth anniversary festival in aid of the orphan and necessitous children of watchmakers and clerks was celebrated, on Tuesday, at the London Tavern—Mr. William Leaf in the chair. Amongst the company present were the Lord Mayor and Mr. S. Morley, M.P. The subscriptions exceeded £1600.

The Royal Horticultural Society's international exhibition of fruits and vegetables will be opened at the South Kensington Gardens on Saturday next. The foreign exhibitors are numerous, and a space of 30,000 of the glass appears likely to be represented. A considerable number of good medals will be awarded.

A meeting of the St. James's Vestry, specially convened, was held on Tuesday to consider the regulations for the supply of the metropolitan cisterns. After considerable discussion it was decided that in a matter of such vast importance it was desirable that not only the vestry should act itself, but that the advice and co-operation of all the governing bodies of the metropolis should be obtained.

On Monday night a large number of gentlemen who interested themselves in the education of the children of the poor of Asiatic and British artists and citizens, which has been held at the Crystal Palace met, at a convivial reunion, in the Freemasons' Tavern, under the presidency of Mr. W. Bowes. There were at least 200 persons present, and amongst them were several Foreigners. The meeting was a very cordial one.

The annual meeting of the members and friends of the Association in behalf of the Poor of Westminster was held on Monday night, at the London Coffee-house, Ludgate-hill. The Lord Mayor presided. The report stated that during the past session 1000 persons had since been delivered up the poor. The subscriptions showed that the charity was much appreciated, and the committee of management had every reason to view the coming season with a balance in hand of £70 4s. The treasurer (Colonel Wilson) and Mr. Alderman Lawrence (Mr. Lott) were re-elected treasurers, and gentlemen addressed the meeting in support of the claims of the charity.

A meeting, convened by the Dean of Westminster, was held on Saturday last, in the Chapter-house of Westminster Abbey, to petition Parliament for the restoration of that ancient edifice. Amongst those present were Lord Stanhope, the Right Hon. W. Cowper, the Dean of St. Paul's, Lord Houghton, the Dean of Chichester, Mr. W. J. Fox, Colonel Reyc, M.P., Mr. Gilbert Scott, R.A. (to whom it was proposed the restoration should be entrusted), Mr. E. M. Ward, R.A., Mr. Cockerell, R.A., Mr. Beresford Hope, and other influential gentlemen. The petition was duly decided on. About £4000 will be required to complete the work.

The births of 2071 children (1008 boys and 1013 girls) were registered in the week ending the 18th instant, exceeding by 1 the 1853-54, the average number, corrected for increase of population, was 1868. The average number in London last week was 1900. In the week the highest week of the year, and the average number of deaths for that week is, with a corrected increase of population, 1900. The deaths last week were 1 per 24, and exhibit a slight decrease on those of the two previous weeks. The deaths from cholera were 1 in Bermondsey, 1 in Lambeth, and 1 in Poplar. The deaths from typhus and carriages were 1 in Bermondsey and 1 in Poplar. Last week the births registered in London and ten other large towns of the United Kingdom were 4071; the deaths registered 2787. The annual rate of mortality was 28 per 1000 persons living. In Liverpool the births were 1, the deaths 527; in Manchester-with-Salford 1, the deaths 317; in Birmingham 314, deaths 72; in Birmingham-with 266, deaths 161; in Leeds-with-Bramley 1, deaths 1; in Bradford-with-Bowling 1, deaths 1; in Sheffield-with-Attercliffe 1, deaths 1; in Hull 1, deaths 1; in Glasgow-with 539, deaths 1; and in Dublin-with 1, deaths 1. The annual rate of mortality last week was 24 per 1000 in Liverpool, 28 in Manchester, 24 in Dublin; 29 in Liverpool, 37 in Manchester, 34 in Salford, 26 in Birmingham, 34 in Leeds, 29 in Bristol, 30 in Hull, and 24 in Sheffield.

A meeting of the Royal National Life-boat Institution was held on Tuesday, in its house, John-street, Adelphi. Rewards amounting to £210 were granted for the saving of 58 lives by the life-boats on the coast of the United Kingdom during the past month in which the Institution was established. The Duke of Northumberland, K.G., presided. The chairman of the institution was voted to Mr. Joshua Heath, chief boatman of coastguard, and coxswain of the Tynemouth life-boat of the second class, for the part he took during in assisting to save, under very perilous circumstances, the crews of twenty-two vessels from the barque Dryburgh, on the morning of the 30th of Wearmouth, of Sunderland. Rewards amounting to £173 were also voted to pay the expenses of twenty-three life-boats of the institution for putting out and rendering assistance to vessels in distress, or for getting off in reply to signals of distress, during the month, although no services were found to be danger. It appears that during these gales the life-boats were instrumental in saving 116 shipwrecked persons. The sum of £1000 was voted to the lately-established station at Penzance, in Cornwall, for the purchase of a new life-boat, to cost £21 from having been saved during the gales of the present month. The sum of £1000 was voted to the Southport, in addition to the £1000 given on the fourteen vessels on the Yarmouth other rewards were granted for saving life from different vessels on our coasts. A considerable amount was also voted to pay the sums ordered to be made on the life-boat establishments of the institution. The sale of £2000 stock by the institution was ordered to be made to meet heavy disbursements. It was reported that George Jeremy, Esq., and Mrs. Jeremy had presented a gold belt to the coxswain of the Penzance life-boat. A communication was read from Captain A. R. Wotton, of the Peninsular and Oriental Company's steam-ship Indus, forwarding a sum of £10 for distribution, and stating that he was using his best endeavours to collect the cost of a life-boat for the Indus, which was presented by the passengers of the Calcutta and Suez, to be presented to the society. Legacies of £100 by the late Captain Brewer, of Kilmarnock, and £100 by the late James Mc'Gill, Guildford, have been received by the institution. The late Mr. Thomas Mr. Dudley Coutts had also recently left the institution legacies. During the past month the Institution has had sent into its establishments at Aldeburgh, Boston, and Cowlay. The rest of the life-boat for Tynemouth had been contributed by the Northumberland and Durham Life-boat Fund, which was exhibited on the slip here, on the way to her station, Lady Houghton, supported by the principal nobility and gentry of the neighbourhood, assisting the boat on the occasion. A public demonstration also took place on the arrival of the life-boat at the Aberdeen station, which was attended by thousands.

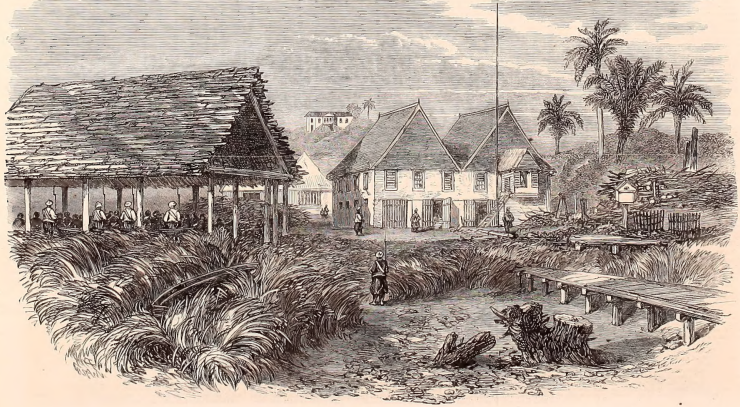
LAW AND POLICE.—The Lord Chancellor gave judgment on Monday in the case of "Wallace v. the Attorney General." The question raised for the first time in the petition was, whether the succession duty on the succession duty in respect of £40,000, the residue of personal property, which was bequeathed by the late Mr. Wallace to the Royal Hospital for Incurables, should be calculated upon the gross amount of the property bequeathed to the hospital, or upon the net sum after the payment of large property, and not personal, both in France and England. It was contended on behalf of the hospital that the duty on the bequeather considered absorbed the succession Duty Act did not apply. The Lord Chancellor, in delivering his judgment, said that the question was one which the future did not intend the Succession Act to apply to such a case as this. It was not applied to cases in which persons were doubtful whether the collecting officer would not himself surrounded by difficulties in attempting to get succession duty, and the only safe way of solving this question was to hold that succession duty was payable only by those who claimed to be entitled to property by virtue of our laws.

In the Court of Queen's Bench last week took place what will probably be the last trial connected with the case of the Alabama, the American Civil War: Captain Peter S. Corbett, of the Sea King, which after having become the Shenandoah, was indicted for a breach of the Foreign Enlistment Act, in having shipped, subjects to serve in the ship after she was taken possession of by Captain Waddell, at the famous transfer of rings near Manicles. Whether Captain Corbett or the Confederate captain ordered every man to be shipped was the question whether, if Captain Corbett did not, he in other ways induced British seamen to join the Shenandoah, was the question. The jury, after a three days' trial, found a verdict, yesterday week, of "Not guilty."

In the Court of Queen's Bench, last Saturday, a washer-woman obtained a verdict for £200 against the Great Western Railway Company for injuries she had sustained through being knocked down by one of the company's vans, which was being driven by a boy under thirteen years of age. The company pleaded that the woman was drunk, and that the accident was the consequence of her own misconduct. The jury found that the boy was not to blame, as he was never required to drive himself in a position of danger would not necessarily exculpate the person doing the injury; but the circumstances of the case would have avoided doing it, and the accident substantially arose from his not doing so. If, therefore, the jury should think that a competent person might have avoided the accident, and that it arose from the driver's acting incompetent, the plaintiff would be entitled to a verdict. If the story on the part of the company was true, that the woman was drunk and had fallen her head, so that no driver, however careful, could have helped driving over her, it would be otherwise. But the fact of her drunk and fall could not exonerate the company.

In the Central Criminal Court, on Monday, Lord Chief Justice Cole, with a special jury, heard the case of "Kynaston v. Leslie." This was an action of ejectment in form to recover possession of Aldford Park, Cheshire, estimated but in reality to decide the right to some extensive estates in Northumberland and Cheshire. The plaintiff, Mr. Kynaston, claimed as the heir-at-law under a will executed by Mr. Hugh Grosvenor, Duke of Westminster, who died in Italian by birth, but he had been naturalised in this country by an Act of Parliament. He was the only son of Mr. Grosvenor, afterwards Earl Grosvenor, and his right, and his claim came under the will of Anthony James, Earl of Normanby, who died in 1863. Under this will Anthony James was granted an Alderton Ratcliffe, the brother of the Earl of Derwentwater. Mr. Radcliffe took part in the rebellion of 1715, and his estates were confiscated at high treasure; but after his conviction he escaped from the Tower and went to France, where he married the Countess of Newburgh, and their only child was a daughter born of the marriage, but of course they were all born after the attainder. Mr. Radcliffe died in 1716, and his daughter in 1744. Lord Derwentwater's brother, Charles Radcliffe, married a lady named Anne Caton Edward; but, the ship being taken by an English man-of-war, he was conveyed to London and committed to the Tower. He was tried, found guilty and liberated, he was sent to execution on his old attainder. The Derwentwater estates became forfeited to the crown, and in 1735 George II., by his letters patent, granted some portion of them, the lands now in question, to Anthony James Lord of Normanby. Mr. Kynaston, in 1857, took the name of Leslie, by which he claimed to be Countess, Ann, for life." He had no children, and his estates, including Aldford Park, were left by will to Mr. Kynaston. Mr. Charles Ratcliffe and Charlotte Maria, Countess of Newburgh; and one of their grandchildren, Charlotte Maria Tollemache, married Mr. Leslie, the defendant in this action. Earl Anthony James left the estates, after the death of his daughter, to Mr. Kynaston, who was the heir-at-law of the Earl, and who claimed to have his right here. The Earl James died in 1763, and his will not included in the specific devise, in trust to sale. The Countess Ann died in 1784, and Mr. Kynaston, the plaintiff, entered on the estates. He, however, could not make out her title except through Charles Ratcliffe, and the fact of his attainder. The jury found a verdict that not prevent her claiming through him. If this were so, then the Earl Derwentwater's title to the estates of Anthony James had failed, and that all his estates would pass, under the residuary clause, to his trustees. The case was adjourned for the production of the will of the Countess Ann's entitled devise, and he boy will she devised, in 1818, all the property to the plaintiff for life. She could not devise the estates in question, in consequence that the attainder of Charles Ratcliffe prevented the defendant claiming through him

THE NEGRO REVOLT IN JAMAICA.



We are indebted to Quartermaster T. J. Mills for the sketches we have this week engraved. The first of them shows the house which was lately the Post Office at Morant Bay, but which is now occupied by the officers and head-quarters of the combined force of soldiers and sailors stationed in that little town. The second is a view of the group of buildings at Morant Bay where the courts-martial held their sittings, with the shed in which the prisoners were confined to the left hand, and the house which forms the temporary residence of Major-General O'Connor, the Commander-in-Chief of the troops in Jamaica, on the high ground in the back of the view. It is here that most of those summary trials and executions have taken place, the justice of which is called in question by many persons in England, but which may probably afford matter for a more deliberate investigation hereafter than it is possible to bestow upon them at the moment, the facts being, as yet, very imperfectly known in this country, and no authentic report of the proceedings of the courts-martial having appeared. In order to save time, on the 20th of October, two Courts were formed, the one composed of Colonel Lewis, of the St. Catherine's Militia; Captain Espeut, of the Kingston Militia; and Captain Astwood, of the Kingston Cavalry; the other composed of Second Lieutenant Brent, commander of the gun-boat Nettle; Second Lieutenant Herrington, commander of the gun-boat Onyx; and Ensign Kelly, of the 4th West India Regiment. The senior Court held its sittings in that part of the double-gabled house which stands near the centre of our view; the junior Court was in the other part of the building, distinguished by a projecting balcony and step-ladder, to the right of the view. The prisoners, amongst whom was Mr. George William Gordon, a member of the Jamaica House of Assembly, who had voluntarily surrendered himself in the town of Kingston, were ranged on the wharf or pier in front of the Courthouse, with a strong guard of negro troops of the 2nd West India Regiment. It was at two o'clock that afternoon (says the meagre account in the colonial newspaper) that the trial of Gordon commenced. He was tried before the military court, presided over by Second Lieutenant Brent. He was given a very patient trial, and was allowed to cross-examine all the witnesses through the President of the Court, and, above all, was permitted to enter into a lengthy defence. The trial lasted till past candle-light, when the court was ordered to be cleared. The Court sat in deliberation for nearly half an hour, during which time there was a profound silence, and each one drew his breath in fearful suspense and anticipation of the future. At the order "Open the court," given to the Provost-Marshal, every eye was bent forward, every ear was eagerly listening, and one could almost fancy that the beating of every heart was heard in the room. But this fearful suspense was heightened still more by the voice of the President of the Court pronouncing only the words, "This Court is dissolved." The prisoner was then taken charge of by the Provost Marshal and led back separate from the other rebels under the Provost Marshal's charge at the station. The same reporter adds, "I have full notes taken of the trial, but I am not permitted to forward them for publication until leave is given me to do so by the Brigadier-General." The charges against George William Gordon were—1st, high treason and sedition against her Majesty the Queen; 2nd, inciting to murder and rebellion.

After sentence had been passed on him, Gordon was kept about thirty-six hours, and then hanged, at eight o'clock on the Monday morning, Oct. 23. Immediately before his death, he wrote the following letter:—

"My beloved Wife,—General Nelson has just been kind enough to inform me that the court-martial on Saturday last has ordered me to be hung, and that the sentence is to be executed in an hour hence; so that I shall be gone from this world of sin and sorrow. I regret that my worldly affairs are so deranged, but now it cannot be helped. I do not deserve this sentence, for I never advised or took part in any insurrection. All I ever did was to recommend the people who complained to seek redress in a legitimate way; and if in this I erred or have been misrepresented, I do not think I deserve the extreme sentence. It is, however, the will of my Heavenly Father that I should thus suffer in obeying His command to relieve the poor and needy, and to protect, as far as I was able, the oppressed. And glory be to His name! And I thank him that I suffer in such a cause. Glory be to God, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ; and I can say it is a great honour thus to suffer, for the servant cannot be greater than his Lord. I can now say with Paul, the aged, 'The hour of my departure is at hand, and

THE TEMPORARY COURTHOUSE AT MORANT BAY, JAMAICA.

I am ready to be offered up. I have fought a good fight, I have kept the faith, and henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give me.' Say to all friends an affectionate farewell, and that they must not grieve for me, for I die innocently. Assure Mr. Alley and all others of the truth of this. Comfort your heart. I certainly little expected this. You must do the best you can, and the Lord will help you, and do not be ashamed of the death your poor husband will have suffered. The Judges seemed against me; and from the rigid manner of the Court I could not get in all the explanation I intended. The man Anderson made an unfounded statement, and so did Gordon; but his testimony was different from the deposition. The Judges took the former and erased the latter. It seemed that I was to be sacrificed. I know nothing of the man Bogle. I never advised him to the act or acts which have brought me to this end. Please write to Mr. Chamerovzow, Lord Brougham, and Messrs. Henckmell and De Bairnon. I did not expect that, not being a rebel, I should have been tried and disposed of in this way. I thought his Excellency the Governor would have allowed me a fair trial, if any charge of sedition or inflammatory language were partly [? fairly] attributable to me; but I have no power of control: may the Lord be merciful to him! General Nelson, who has just come for me, has faithfully promised to let you have this. May the Lord bless him, and all the soldiers and sailors, and all men. Say farewell to Mr. Phillips, also Mr. Lloyd, Mr. Bell, Mr. Vinon, and Mr. Henry Dalmar, and many others whom I do not now remember, but who have been true and faithful to me. As the General has come, I must close. Remember me to Aunt Eliza in England, and tell her not to be ashamed of my death. Now, my dearest one, the most beloved and faithful, the Lord bless, help, preserve, and keep you. A kiss for dear mamma, who will be kind to you and Janet. Kiss also Annie and Jane. Say good-by to dear Mr. Davison, and all others. I have only been allowed one hour. I wish more time had been allowed. Farewell also to Mr. Rispett, who sent up my private letter to him. And now may the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with us all.

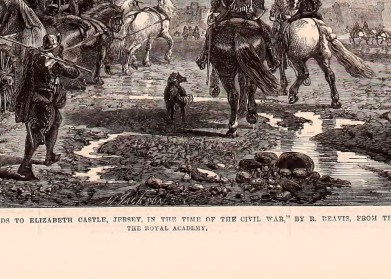
"Your truly devoted and now nearly dying husband,

"G. W. GORDON."

"I asked leave to see Mr. Panther, but the General said I could not. I wish him farewell in Christ. Remember me to auntie and father. Mr. Barassy has for the last two days been kind to me. I thank him."

THE LATE PROFESSOR LINDLEY.

THERE or four weeks ago we had to record the death of Dr. Lindley, one of the most eminent of modern English botanists and the author of the best books we have upon various departments of that science. He was born on the 5th of February, 1799, at Catton, near Norwich, where his father was proprietor of a large nursery-garden. After leaving the Grammar School of Norwich he devoted his attention to botanical studies. In 1819 he published a translation of "Richards's Analyse du Fruit," and in 1820 a work entitled "Monographia Rosarum," in which he described several new species of roses. About the same period he contributed to the Transactions of the Linnean Society various papers on botanical subjects. Some time afterwards he came to London, where he became assistant-secretary to the Horticultural Society, and was engaged by



THE LATE DR. LINDLEY, PROFESSOR OF BOTANY.

Mr. London to write the descriptive portion of his "Encyclopedia of Plants," the merit of which, as a botanical work, was entirely due to him, as was stated in the preface. The "Encyclopedia" was completed in 1829. In the same year he was appointed Professor of Botany at University College, London. At this period the Linnean system was almost universally followed by English botanists. It is one of the chief merits of Dr. Lindley that he early saw the necessity of superseding the artificial by the natural classification of plants. In an essay on this subject, contained in his "Introduction to the Natural System of Botany," published in 1830, he showed very clearly what the advantages of this system were, and thus paved the way for its general adoption in England. Two years later he published the "Introduction to Systematic and Physiological Botany, and a Synopsis of the British Flora," in which our indigenous plants were arranged and described for the first time according to the natural system. In a "Natural System of Botany," published in 1836, Dr. Lindley took new views of botanical classification, and proposed a new nomenclature for the families of plants. Ten years later his great work, "The Vegetable Kingdom," was published. This work, the most elaborate that had appeared on systematic botany, gave a description of all the families of plants, and more especially of those useful to man. It gave very extended lists of the genera, and was generally recognised as one of the most important contributions which had at that time appeared on systematic botany. While engaged in writing these works Dr. Lindley was most diligently employed, as a practical botanist, in describing new species, on which he wrote a large number of papers published in botanical publications. In 1841 he became editor of the Gardener's Chronicle, a weekly publication, which he conducted with great ability. In 1860 he was appointed examiner in the University of London. He was a Ph.D. of Munich and a Fellow of the Royal Society, of which, in 1858, he received the medal as a reward for his services to botanical science. Our Portrait is from a photograph by Messrs. Maull and Polyblank.

"MILITARY TRAIN CROSSING THE SANDS TO ELIZABETH CASTLE, JERSEY—TIME OF THE CIVIL WAR." PAINTED BY R. BEAVIS.

THE visitor to Jersey will be aware that the boldly and picturesquely situated fortress Elizabeth Castle (so named from its chief foundress, "Queen Bess") is only accessible on the land side for a short time at low water, and by a naturally-formed causeway of shingle and sand. And the visitor may remember an amusing, vivacious, and picturesque scene often witnessed during the short interval allowed for land communications—horses and carts trotting over the wet sands; children scampering; fisher-folk, people of the garrison, or other chance of men and women, hurrying to and fro between the castle and the mainland, often pursued by the "fast-flowing tide." Doubtless, Mr. Beavis, the painter of the picture we engrave—a comparatively young but meritorious and "rising artist"—is familiar with the scene to which we refer. His imagination, however, has wandered with artist-like instinct back to those still more picturesque old times, a necessary incident of which he has cleverly realised, when the "loyal" Jerseymen mused, manned, and put in a state of defence the almost impregnable old castle. The incident here rendered must, as we have said, necessarily have been one of ordinary occurrence during the Civil War. But, although it is probable the painter did not intend to represent any particular event, yet we are at liberty to suppose that these preparations are being made at the particular period when the Parliamentarians had at length, after the death of Charles, gained possession of the sister island of Guernsey, and when, therefore, the danger to the Jersey islanders of an attack became imminent. That attack, as is well known, was not long delayed; and Jersey, after having been persistently held for Charles by Sir George Carteret, and after having afforded a refuge to Charles II.

"MILITARY TRAIN CROSSING THE SANDS TO ELIZABETH CASTLE, JERSEY, IN THE TIME OF THE CIVIL WAR," BY R. BEAVIS, FROM THE 73RD EXHIBITION OF THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

while an exile, bethebore and after his father's death, at last fell into the hands of the Parliamentarians, under Admiral Blake and General Haines. And often at other periods has the historic little island been attacked: often, too, perhaps, has this very spot been the scene of preparations to resist other assailants. As early as the reign of Edward III. the Jerseymen repulsed the famous Constable of France, Du Guesclin. In the Wars of the Roses it was attacked by a Norman Baron, Pierre de Berne, who, though he obtained possession of part of the island, was ultimately forced to surrender. During the Civil Wars in England, Sir Walter Raleigh's Castle, the last stronghold of the three, in December, 1780, being most memorable. The Baron de Rullecourt, with 700 men, had landed at Grouville Bay, and seized the Lieutenant-Governor, Major Corbet, prisoner, and induced him to sign a capitulation. But Major Pierson, the second in command, at the head of the British troops and the island militia, refused to sign the capitulation, and attacking the French, killed Rullecourt with the greater part of his men, and obliged the rest to surrender. This brilliant exploit, and the fall, at its commencement, of the gallant Major Pierson is the subject of a painting by Copley, now in South Kensington, which ranks amongst the noblest historical pictures of the English school. It is one of the most touching reminiscences of Jersey, also, that there, like the "Merrie Monarch," Henry VII., found refuge when Earl of Richmond and an exile.

We should add that Mr. Beaufa's picture was in the last Academy exhibition; but, like many other worthy of similar mention, it was hung too high for a fair examination of its numerous figures.

BUGLARY IN MANCHESTER.
Townhall, Manchester, May 27, 1816.
Gentlemen,—I am instructed by Sir S. Armitage, the Chairman of the Watch-committee, to inform you that your Patent Strong Holdfast Safe (supplied by you about two years since) was broken open by burglars on Thursday night last, and that you are requested also to remove the stanchs of bugles on Friday night next. It is believed that the thieves must have been at work for many hours, as they left several broken instruments behind them. A reward is now offered for apprehension of the offenders, on Saturday, in trying to open the Safe, in which we lodged our specie all the tools, and, after repairing them, to return them to you. Your men will be here at 10 o'clock on Saturday and Monday, when the valuable contents of the Safe were formerly deposited.
I am, Gentlemen, yours respectfully,
To Messrs. Tann, Milner, and Sons, Victoria Steel Works, Liverpool. | H. C. Sherry.

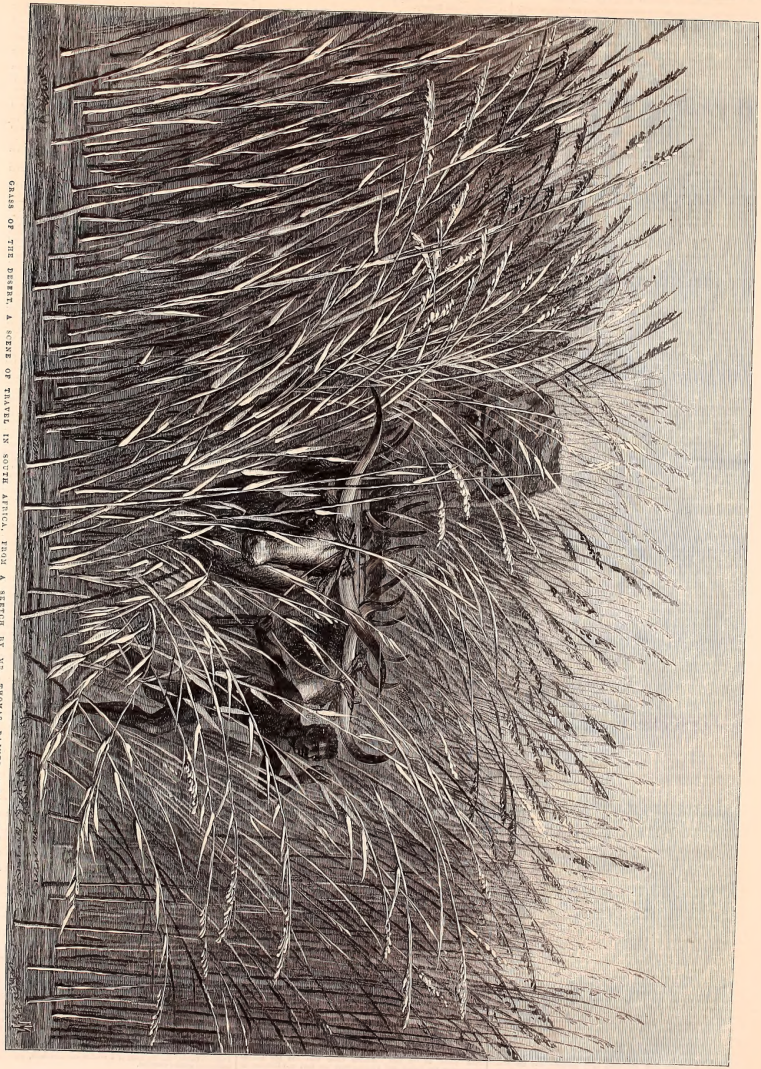
LONDON: SATURDAY, DECEMBER 9, 1865.

Her Majesty has been pleased to sanction the announcement that, should health permit, the Queen will open the new Parliament, which is summoned for the 1st of February. It would be difficult to exaggerate a description of the gratification which these pleasant tidings have afforded to a loyal and affectionate people.

The nation has never been party to the attempts which have been made to induce the Royal Widow to leave her seclusion earlier than a time of her own selection. The sympathy of the people in the hour of their Queen's great affliction was not merely emotional, and to pass away with the first bitter feelings that attended her bereavement and our own. When the sudden and heavy blow fell, doubtless the natural instincts of kindly hearts led them to dwell upon the personal sorrow, on the lonely hearth, on the cheerless board, on the silent home. One profoundly earnest voice went up to the Royal mourner, to assure her that all felt with her and for her—



Him whom she loved we loved. We shared her joy,
And would not be denied to share her grief.

From that time the people of England, though anxiously watching the domestic life of their Monarch, and at all times noticing with satisfaction any indication that the first terrible suffering was being succeeded by the calm which the healer, Time, mercifully brings to the relief of Sovereign and of peasant, stood aloof with a natural, remarkable delicacy. That such a sorrow was not to be measured by an ordinary standard; and there has never been, during the four years of her Majesty's retirement, the least reproach, or any class worth naming, to disturb the only process by which we could hope to see the Queen restored to health and strength. Any occasional petulant outcry was at once recognised as made in behalf of a few vain, selfish, or interested persons, and was not thought worth even a rebuke. The nation was with the Queen, who knew it, and could not have heeded, if she even heard, the murmurs from behind a West-End counter or from a dowager's carriage. We rejoice that there will never be the slightest attempt cast to such demonstrations of what an English gentleman characterises most fatally when he quietly calls it bad taste.

But we do not desire that this instinctive and respectful course of action on the part of the people of the realm should but its true and chief cause. We felt with the wife who had lost the husband of her love, the sharer of her happiness, the beloved father of her children; but there was more. The people felt that their Queen was in common loss. That not a the Royal wife become a widow, but the Sovereign had lost the wisest and kindliest of counsellors. The real character and nobleness of the Prince Consort were never so completely appreciated as since the late years of his life, when they were quite appreciated until he could serve us no longer; perhaps even now his invaluable merits are not altogether understood by some whose admiration can be excited only by incessant speeches and a variety of demonstrative activity. But the great mass of the nation had acquired a worthy idea of the talents and single-heartedness of the Prince Consort, and knew how well he had discharged his vows to the bride he had received at the altar. And when it was the certain knowledge that the Sovereign had suddenly been deprived of one whose advice and assistance made her arduous duties comparatively light and easy, it did doubly incumbent on the subject not merely to bear with patience, but to approve for its wisdom, the seclusion into which the Queen retired. We knew that the Sovereign was about, as it were, to enter anew upon her great office, chastened, unaided, the considerations of the innumerable questions which had been presented to her in easier form, reduced to order, condensed to point, by the keen mind and skilful method of her husband; and that it was an act of duty for a country with a reserved nature, to undertake labour which had so long been lightened for her. We knew, too, that, when the first grief had been succeeded by calmness, the Queen had called her family round her, and—if her actual words may not have been accurately conveyed from the chamber of sorrow to the outside world, there was no doubt of their import—the Sovereign had reminded her fatherless children that their best tribute to her father was that they had lost was to sustain her in the duty in which he had aided her so well. That was enough, more than enough, for a loving and trusting people; and had the Queen prolonged the retirement with that emotion which will mingle pride, gladness, thankfulness. We are informed that our Queen's voice is not to be heard on the coming occasion—save, we may assume, in the usual command to the Lords. The fatigue of reading an address, which will be weighted with topics of unusual importance, is to be spared to the Queen. But her re-appearance in the splendid and significant pageant that illustrates the Constitution of the realm will be the event of the time. Respectfully we would tender to our Sovereign, heartily to our Queen, the sincerest congratulations on the Queen's return to the enjoyment of her duties, and to the exercise of her high prerogatives.

The decoration of the Victoria cross has been conferred upon Captain Hugh Shaw, of the 18th Regiment, for an act of bravery performed in a skirmish with the natives of New Zealand.

GRASS OF THE DESERT. A SCENE OF TRAVEL IN SOUTH AFRICA. FROM A SKETCH BY MR. THOMAS BAINES. —SEE NEXT PAGE.

SCENES OF SOUTH AFRICAN TRAVEL.

AMONGST the new books of last season which were reviewed, as usual, in this paper was the narrative, by Mr. Thomas Baines, of his explorations in South-west Africa, comprising a journal of fifteen months' travelling, in 1861 and 1862, from Walfisch Bay, on the west coast, directly across the continent, by Lake Ngami, to the great Victoria Falls of the Zambesi River. Mr. Baines, who, as an explorer, had been engaged in several previous expeditions—first in North Australia, next in the Trans-Vaal territory of South Africa, and afterwards in the ascent of the Zambesi from the east coast, with Dr. Livingstone's party, in 1859—is one of the most indefatigable and persevering of British pioneers of science and commerce who have done such important service of late years in this direction. He is, moreover, an artist whose powers in the delineation of scenery and natural history are displayed in a magnificent series of Views of the Victoria Falls, which have been exhibited at the office of the Royal Geographical Society, and which are being prepared for publication by Mr. Stanford, in one, in the form of circumambient panorama, in a set of his incidental sketches, illustrating especially the strange adventures and experiences of the explorer's waggon-journey, the conduct of the native tribes, and the varieties of wild beasts which haunt that great wilderness, traversed so rarely by white men, and never before supplied to us for the Engravings, which will, from time to time, appear in this Journal, and be here furnished us, likewise, with a more striking view of the Victoria Falls, from a position not hitherto presented in any of the views published elsewhere. The Engraving on page 557 of this Number, entitled "The Grass of the Veldt," gives a strong idea of the thick growth of rank and luxuriant vegetation in some parts of the tropical region, as also appears from Mr. Baines's Mr. James Chapman, his comrade, made their return journey from the Zambesi to the south, towards the end of the rainy season, and found the grass springing up no less than 12ft. high, and as thick as a man's little finger, along the track which they followed on their journey of the year before, and which could only be discerned, with some difficulty, by finding the places where their waggon-wheels had crushed the grass, or had left a perceptible trace in the charred stumps left by a conflagration. As the waggons moved on through this gigantic herbage, nothing could be seen but the tops of the grass and the long ears and the native driver by their side. An elephant, though also of large size, could not be discovered even by a practised eye. This state of things, it has been observed, was in the rainy season, when the grass, though few and far between, grows to such an abundance of water and ornamented with the blue lotos, the roots of which, by-the-way, Mr. Baines describes as the most delicate food we ate the wild grapes of South Africa is fruit to be despised. In the country, he had passed eastward through the same dry season, when he had passed eastward through the same country, he had not fared so well, as the readers of his book will doubtless recollect.

SCENE FROM "KING JOHN" AT DRURY-LANE THEATRE.

THIS revival of one of Shakespeare's noblest historical plays has continued, since the first week of November, to attract very good audiences to Drury-Lane. Mr. Charles Dillon's personation of the King, and Miss Atkinson that of Queen Constance; while that of the bastard Falconbridge is played by Mr. James Anderson, and Mr. Swinburne represents the gallant Hubert. The scenery, painted by Mr. Beverley, is most effective and characteristic, especially the interior of the ancient Gothic hall, with its rich tapestries and armour on the walls and castle of the beleaguered town of Angiers; Northampton Castle likewise, and the remembered Abbey of Swinstead, Lincolnshire, are set before the spectators with Mr. Beverley's usual success. The last scene, of which we present an illustration, shows the death of King John on his couch in the cloistered garden of Swinstead Abbey, where the monks, in solemn, mixed white copes of the Cistercian order, struggles through the mist of the evening, and harmonises with the solemn interest of the occasion.

THE COURT.

THE Queen, with the junior members of the Royal family, continues at Windsor Castle, in the enjoyment of good health.

On Thursday her Majesty, accompanied by the Crown Prince and Crown Princess of Prussia, drove in the castle grounds. The Maharajah Duleep Singh and the Maharanee visited her Majesty and dined with the Queen. After dinner her Majesty's private band played a selection of music in the drawing-room during the absence of the Royal family and the Maharajah and Maharanee, and the ladies and gentlemen in waiting.

Yesterday week the Queen, accompanied by the Crown Princess of Prussia and Princess Helena, walked and drove in the grounds of the castle. The Crown Princess of Prussia went shooting. The Princess Louise of Schleswig-Holstein arrived at the castle from the Continent. This was the anniversary of the birthday of the Prince Consort. The bells of St. George's Chapel and St. John's Church were rung at intervals during the day, and the town hoisted numerous flags in honour of the Long Walk.

On Saturday her Queen, accompanied by the Crown Prince and Crown Princess of Prussia, Princess Helena, Princess Louise, and Prince Christian of Schleswig-Holstein, walked and drove in the grounds. Prince Arthur, attended by Major Elphinstone, arrived at the castle from Greenwich Park. The Crown Prince and Crown Princess of Prussia, with their children, left the castle soon after noon for Berlin. The Queen, with the members of the Royal family, accompanied their Royal Highnesses to the Windsor railway station. Upon leaving her Majesty, accompanied by Princess Helena and Princess Louise, drove in the grounds of the castle. Prince Leopold and Prince Christian of Schleswig-Holstein, attended by Major-General the Hon. A. H. Hood, arrived.

On Sunday the Queen, Princess Helena, Princess Louise, Prince Arthur, the Duke of Edinburgh, and Prince Christian of Schleswig-Holstein, attended Divine service in the private chapel of the castle. The Rev Stopford A. Brookes, M.A., late chaplain to the Embassy at Berlin, officiated.

On Monday the Queen, accompanied by Princess Louise and attended by the Hon. Harriet Phipps, drove out in the carriage. Princess Helena took a drive. Prince Christian of Schleswig-Holstein went to London, returning in the afternoon. Prince Arthur, attended by Major Elphinstone, left the castle for Greenwich Park.

On Tuesday the Queen held a Council, at which were present Earl Granville, Earl Cairns, Earl Beauchamp, Earl Bathurst, Lord Cross, Mr. George Grey, and the Right Hon. W. Gladstone. The Right Hon. Charles Bruce, M.P., was sworn and took his seat as an audience by the Right Hon. Sir George Grey, upon being appointed Chief Secretary for Ireland. Earl Granville, Earl Cairns, and the Right Hon. W. Gladstone had audiences of the Queen. The Earl of Caithness and Lieutenant-Colonel Lygon were the Lord and Groom in Waiting. Mr. Helps was Clerk of the Council. At the Council Parliament was further prorogued from Thursday, the 30th ult., to Thursday, the 8th Feb. 1, on which day the Queen will open Parliament in person. The meeting of Convocation of the province of Canterbury and York was also further prorogued to Friday, Feb. 2. The Queen, accompanied by Princess Helena, walked and drove in the grounds. Prince Arthur, Prince Christian of Schleswig-Holstein went shooting. Princess Louise, attended by Lady Caroline Barrington, the Hon. Mary Lascelles, and Lieutenant-Colonel Du Plat, went to London and honoured the Adelphi Theatre with her presence, arriving in Windsor by special train at half-past ten o'clock. The train was fitted with the electric system of communication between passengers and guards. The Dean of Westminster and Lady Augusta Stanley arrived at the castle, and had the honour of dining with her Majesty.

On Wednesday the Queen, accompanied by Princess Helena, drove in the castle grounds. Prince Christian visited the cavalry barracks at Windsor. Prince Frederick of Schleswig-Holstein, first cousin to Prince Christian, visited the Queen.

The Countess of Caledon has succeeded Lady Waterpark as Lady in Waiting to the Queen. The Earl of Caithness and Lieutenant-Colonel Kingscote have succeeded Lord Methuen and the Hon. Mortimer Sackville West as Lord and Groom in Waiting. Major-General the Hon. A. N. Hood and Lieutenant-Colonel Du Plat have succeeded Charles Murray and Colonel H. Ponsonby as Equerries in Waiting to her Majesty.

Mr. G. Robertson has been honoured by Prince Frederick William, Princess Charlotte, Prince Henry, and Prince Sigismund of Prussia with sittings for their portraits.

Messrs. Hills and Saunders have had the honour of photographing, at Windsor Castle, the Crown Prince and Crown Princess of Prussia, with their children, and other members of the Royal family.

THE PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF WALES.

The Prince of Wales joined the "meet" of the West Norfolk hounds, on Wednesday week, at Congham House, the seat of R. Bevan, Esq. The Princess of Wales rode with the Prince to the meet. The Prince and Princess rode Congham horses. The Prince of Congham Carr was next drawn, and a fox found, which was quickly set upon the scent of the Hon. W. Fellowes and Mr. Thursby. The chase afterwards rode to Grimstone-common, where the hounds soon found, and a fine run was had to Wolferton Westacre, where the fox was last and the day ended without a "kill."

On Thursday week the Prince, accompanied by the Earl of Dunmore, Viscount Newry, Captain Fark Lane, Mr. A. Hammond, Mr. Probyn, and Mr. S. Gregory, shot through Wolferton Park and Wolferton Covert. The Prince and party were joined at luncheon by the Princess, accompanied by Princess Victoria of Schleswig-Holstein and Hon. Mrs. E. Coke. The day's sport was concluded in Wolferton Wood. Prince de Teck arrived at Sandringham House.

Yesterday week was the twenty-fifth anniversary of the birthday of the Princess. Early in the morning the children of the West Newton school marched to Sandringham, and presented to their Royal Highness. The birthday presents to the Princess were numerous and valuable, including a gift of jewels presented by the Mayor, Aldermen, and Burgesses of Norwich, and a gold dressing-case, enriched with precious stones, and studded with the Prince's feathers, from the Danish Minister, and the numerous guests staying at Sandringham House paid their respects to the Princess in the morning. The Princess, with the ladies visiting her, joined the Prince and party in the woods during the day. At four o'clock all the labourers employed on the Prince's estate, with their wives and children, met at the new house, which had been transformed into a dining-hall, and partook of a dinner of good cheer. The Prince and Princess of Wales left, and concluded the Prince and Princess, accompanied by their guests, entered the dining-hall. The Sandringham Band, and the band of the Hamilton Hundred Rifle Volunteers played a selection of music. After the dinner, which was served in excellent style, the cloth was drawn. The toast was received with enthusiastic applause by all present. The Earl of Dunmore returned thanks for the Prince, which was received with due honours. The Prince afterwards proposed the health of the Queen, after which their Royal Highnesses left the room, to the strains of the national air for the children of the Sandringham, West Newton, Dersingham, and Wolferton schools, who remained to take supper. At 8.30 the Prince arrived and were regaled with tea, after which they sang several songs and left the room. The Prince and Princess returned to Marlborough upon Sandringham Heights. The Prince and his guests drove, in two waggonettes, to Sandringham House, and were received by Princess, from whom arose a hearty cheer for the Princess and for the infant Princes. The labourers remained outside the house, singing, after they passed the evening pleasantly until ten o'clock, when they all did separate. The Prince and Princess entertained at dinner the Prince de Teck, the Danish Minister, the Hon. Alexander Duff and the Viscountess Royston, Sir Edmund and the Hon. Lady Filmer, Viscount Newry, Captain Fark Lane, Captain Probyn, Mr. S. Gilpoinhe, the Hon. C. R. Carington, Lieutenant-General Knollys, Major-General the Hon. A. H. Byng, Lieutenant-Colonel Keppel, Major Teesdale, Mr. Fiser, Mr. and Holman. In the evening their Royal Highnesses and the Princess Victoria followed had the honour of receiving invitations —Marquis and Marchioness Townshend and Lady Adelaide Townshend, Major Alison, Mr. Lowry Corbet, Mr. Henry Seymour, the Earl and Countess of Leicester and the Ladies Coke, Lord and Lady Rendlesham and the Hon. Misses Rendlesham, Miss Hoste, Captain Seymour, Mrs. Knollys and the Misses Knollys, the Hon. E. Byng, Lord Suffield and the Hon. Mrs. and Mrs. Villebois and Miss Bagge, the Countess of Kinnoull and the Hon. Miss Hay, Mrs. Hilliard, Mrs. Hall, Mr. Wodehouse, M.P., the Hon. R. Leslie Melville, Mr. F. Villiers, Mr. H. Jermingham, Mr. F. Custance, Mr. and Mrs. Hay Mackenzie, Mr. Hamond Graeme, Rev. W. A. and Mrs. Keppel and Miss Keppel, Mr. and Mrs. Elwes, Mr. and Mrs. Alexander Baring, Mr. and Mrs. G. B. Mure, Mr. and Mrs. Hall, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Gurney, Mr. and Mrs. Somerville Gurney, Mr. H. Colthran, Captain and Mrs. Mason, Rev. C. W. and Mrs. Bagot, the Rev. L. B. Bagot, Mr. and Mrs. Hoare, and Mr. Lloyd. The Prince was in attendance. At King's Lynn the bells of St. Margaret's Church were rung, and a royal salute was fired. The town was gaily decorated with flags. In the metropolis illuminations were general at the West-End; and the Prince received congratulations on the Princess gave a ball in celebration of the event at the Hanover-square Rooms, at which about 300 persons were present.

On Sunday the Prince and Princess attended Divine service at Sandringham Church, which was filled to overflowing.

On Monday the Prince and Princess, accompanied by the Earl of Dunmore and Viscount and Viscountess Royston and attended by the Misses Keppel and Miss Knollys, visited Wolferton Station, left Sandringham House on a visit to Lord and Lady Suffield at Gunton Park. Their Royal Highnesses left Wolferton station, and travelled thence by special train to Lynn, and thence continued their journey via Norwich and Yarmouth to Lowestoft Station, Suffolk, arriving at Beccham at ten minutes past one. The train was under the charge of Mr. Stevenson, district superintendent at Norwich, and Mr. Stevenson, district superintendent at Norwich, was also in attendance. At the Beccham Station the 4th Norfolk rifle volunteer corps, under the command of Captain Bulwer, served as a guard of honour, and Suffield, Lord Lieutenant of Norfolk, and Lady Suffield, Rudstead Harbord received the Prince and Princess at the station. Their Royal Highnesses proceeded in an open carriage drawn by four greys on their way to Gunton Park, followed by Lord Suffield in a drag, the Lordship driving four in hand. The route lay up the Norwich-road, through the village of Gunton, and through Gunton Park, where Bawdswell, to Reepham, where horses were changed at the King's Arms and the Lord Lieutenant and party partook of refreshments. The 6th Norfolk, or Aylsham, volunteers, under the command of Captain Lord Walpole, were drawn up in front of the King's Arms hotel, and presented arms and played the National Anthem and "God Bless the Prince of Wales." Upon reaching the park the Prince joined Lord Suffield upon the box of the drag, and the cortège proceeded via Aylsham, to Blickling Park, the seat of Viscount Lumley's and ridden out to meet the Royal cortège. At Alby Horse Shoes they joined the road, and, after the Prince and Princess had passed, the carriages from the neighbouring towns were also drawn up along the line of route. The Royal Highnesses arrived at Gunton at four o'clock, after a drive of twenty-four miles. Throughout the whole the Prince and Princess were received with the utmost enthusiasm from a huge number of people, the inhabitants of whom were assembled in force at every village. Lord Suffield, the towns of Dereham, Reepham, and Aylsham were gaily decorated with triumphal arches, evergreens, and banners. A large party staying at Gunton had the honour of meeting the Prince and Princess at dinner. During the dinner-party the Lord Suffield Militia performed a selection of airs.

On Tuesday the Prince, accompanied by Lord Suffield, the Earl of Leicester, Earl Spencer, Lord Rendlesham, Lord Alfred Paget, Lord Berkeley Paget, Viscount Hamilton, Viscount Royston, the Hon. H. Harbord, &c., passed the day shooting in the Gunton preserves, Thorpe Wood being the locality selected. The total result of the day's campaign was 2131 killed, of which sanctuary bag 200 head fell to the Prince's gun. In the evening a dinner-party took place at the hall. Among those who had the honour of meeting the Prince and Princess were the Earl and Countess of Leicester, Lord and Lady Sondes, Earl and Countess Spencer, the Earl of Rendlesham, Lord and Lady Alfred Paget, Lord and Lady Rendlesham, Lord and Lady Royston, Lord Hamilton, Lord Berkeley Paget, &c. The band of the East Norfolk Militia performed during dinner. Later in the evening a ball was given, to which the leading members of the aristocracy of the county were invited. Dancing commenced at ten o'clock. The Prince opened the first quadrille with Lady Suffield. Lord Suffield danced with the Princess. The company retired at half-past two.

On Wednesday the Prince and the guests at the hall passed the day shooting.

The Prince and Princess are expected to return to Sandringham House to-day (December 9).

The cottages that have been erected at West Newton are completed, and occupied by the Prince's tenants, and last week his Royal Highness inspected them. The Princess, attended by the Hon. Mrs. E. Coke and Mr. W. Carmichael, also inspected the cottages, and expressed herself highly gratified with the accommodation they afforded and with the substantial manner in which they were kept by the occupants. By the command of the Prince these cottages are to be called the Alexandra Cottages.

The Marchioness of Carmarthen has succeeded the Hon. Mrs. E. Coke in attendance on the Princess. Lieutenant-Colonel Keppel has succeeded Major Teesdale as Equerry in Waiting to the Prince.

The Dublin Express says there are at the disposal of the Government in Ireland about 16,000 men of all arms—comprising 1200 artillery, with Colonel Armstrong and Major Hamilton, of the Royal Irish Artillery—which can be augmented, if necessary, by the Royal Engineers and Military Train.

The excavations at Slack, the site of Camkodunum, near Huddersfield, have been continued during the past week, and a smaller hypocaust has been found. It is an elevation of the former one, and therefore it must have been of later date, as the reverse was the case at Virginia's site the world "Judex Cadit." A thumb ring, a bronze fibula, and a coin of Nero, with other interesting relics have been discovered.

The Manchester City Council, on Wednesday, rescinded, by a majority of two to one, the resolution passed in March, 1864, as to the terms on which Queen's Park for Hulme and Moss-side should be opened to the general purpose, consent for which was instructed to be given on the terms of the original deed of gift, which was to the effect that the park should be open on set days only. A proposal that the park should be divided equally between Manchester, Chorlton, and Hulme was rejected.

A new Congregational church was opened, on Tuesday, at Pensby Moss, Heswall. It is an elevation of stone, relieved by the coloured stone from the materials of the district. A much lower rate of fire insurance has been accepted in consequence of the improvements. The house, which has been designed by Mr. David McGibbon, of Edinburgh, is extensively altered, and will accommodate 2000 persons.

Yesterday week Sir Charles Fox met at Liverpool a number of the local engineers, town councillors, members of the Dock Board, the Landsdowne Commissioners, and other influential gentlemen for the purpose of explaining his plans for constructing a junction line between Liverpool and Birkenhead, under the River Mersey. Mr. E. Lawrence, ex-mayor, presided. Sir Charles Fox showed that the proposed railway would be of the best mercantile kind on a large scale at Sydenham, and one was now being constructed under the bed of the Thames, between Charing-cross and the Waterloo station. The proposed railway from Liverpool to Birkenhead was a mile and three-eighths in length. There would be one station at Liverpool and one at Birkenhead. The cost was estimated at £200,000, with borrowing powers to raise the capital to £400,000. The time occupied in the transit would be much reduced if the bed of the river were found to consist of rock instead of sand. The dock dues would be the same as at present, and the charge of £20,000 a year, to pay a five per cent interest on the capital, for working expenses. The speed would be at the rate of twenty miles an hour, and each train (or steam-engine) would carry about 500 passengers. Fares would be charged 1d., 2d., and 3d., according to class. In answer to numerous questions, it was explained that there would be no tunnels required, and the carriages, luxurious and well lighted, would always be in plenty of fresh air. It was also explained that no opposition to the Birkenhead Docks and the side of the Mersey was anticipated. Several gentlemen resident on both sides of the river expressed their high approval of the scheme.

LAW.—The trials of the Fenians are proceeding at Dublin. Yesterday (Friday) the case was concluded in which Mr. Luby was found "Guilty" of treason-felony, and sentenced to twenty years' penal servitude. He indignantly denied that he had received any money from the Fenian association as that charged against him. Byrne, the watchman in Birchamd Gloss, charged with aiding in the escape of Kelly, was also found guilty, committed to take his trial. All the Fenian prisoners—thirty-three in number—were removed from Richmond Bridewell to the Richmond Penitentiary Prison, late Richmond Bridewell, on Saturday last. On Monday morning Captain Talbot, the governor, and a number of the mounted police, Mr. Arrowsmith, a clerk to the Crown, and Mr. Hamilton, arrived on Monday. Several documents of a revolutionary character were found on his person. On Wednesday Mr. O'Leary was found guilty, and sentenced to penal servitude for twenty years.

The case of "The Rev. Mrs. Longworth or Yelverton" against the proprietors of the Saturday Review, for libel in an article published on the 26th of July, 1862, came up for trial in the Court of Queen's Bench, at Edinburgh, on Monday, and ended on Wednesday. The damages were laid at £5000. The jury remanded for three hours to deliberate, and then returned into court saying they were equally divided and could not agree. The Judge, however, refused to discharge them, and they went back to deliberate; they produced a change in the minds of three of the jurymen, and by a verdict of nine to six the plaintiff was awarded £100 damages and costs.

For the amusement of youthful parties in the coming season, of Christmas Day, and Mrs. Alexander Lindsay, of Balcarres, has invented a great variety of pretty toys, made of embossed and coloured paper or cardboard, some of which are constructed on mechanical principles, with little pictures of agreeable and appropriate subjects. Messrs. Joseph Evans and Sons, of Newgate-street, have issued a pack of cards, each stamped with a facsimile of one of the coins of the realm, by which the new game of "change for a sovereign" may be played, with the benefit of teaching young folks how to count their money.

In the obituary of the Times of Tuesday, the deaths of four Indies and three gentlemen are recorded whose united ages amounted to 692 years, giving an average of eighty-six years to each. On Monday the list was almost as remarkable, as the deaths of five ladies and one gentleman appeared whose ages amounted to 605 years, or an average of eighty-seven years and two months to each. Taking the two consecutive days, it would appear that the united ages of the nine ladies and four gentlemen who died were 1297, affording an average of eighty-five years and rather more than one month to each.

THE MEETING OF PARLIAMENT.

THE following Royal proclamation, calling together Parliament for the dispatch of business on the 1st of February next, was published in Tuesday's Gazette :—

BY THE QUEEN.—A PROCLAMATION.

VICTORIA R.

Whereas our Parliament stands prorogued to Thursday, the 26th day of January next, inclusive. We, with the advice of our Privy Council, do hereby publish and declare that the said Parliament shall be further prorogued on the said 26th day of December instant, to Thursday, the 1st day of February next, and we have given orders to our Chancellor of that part of our United Kingdom called Great Britain to prepare a writ patent for proroguing the same accordingly; and we do hereby further, with the advice aforesaid, declare our Royal will and pleasure that the said Parliament shall, on the said Thursday, the 1st day of February next, assemble and be holden for the dispatch of divers special and important affairs; and to that end Our Royal and Temporal, and the Knights, Citizens, and Burgesses, and the Commissioners for Shires and Burghs of the House of Commons, [are hereby required and commanded to give their attendance accordingly at Westminster, on the said Thursday, the 1st day of February next.

Given at our Court at Windsor, this 5th day of December, in the year of Our Lord, 1865, and in the 29th of our reign.

God save the Queen.

In the Times of Thursday appears the following paragraph concerning the opening of Parliament:—"It will have been remarked that in the announcement of her Majesty's intention to open the new Parliament it was stated that there would be certain modifications in the ceremonial observances. We are informed that her Majesty, instead of using the old unwieldy state coach, will occupy what is called 'a close carriage,' and that the Prince of Wales will be present, and her Majesty, will be laid upon the throne; and that the speech, instead of being read by her Majesty, will be read by the Lord Chancellor."

The Government guarantees for the future the correctness of the tables, and Government actuaries are given to the examination of rules and the like of any particular society a person may wish to join.

The Temps says:—"Bull-fights no longer suffice in Spain. Le Petit Journal de Madrid announces that the Queen has ordered a new kind of representation. An elephant of the name of Pizarro fought heavily against a bull on the 19th ult. The animal, after it had thrown its back, hesitated, then, seizing one of the bulls by the neck, he sent it rolling to the ground. The bull, however, succeeded in rising, and once more laid enormous feet. The antique sports are thus again the order of the day. Imperial encouragement."

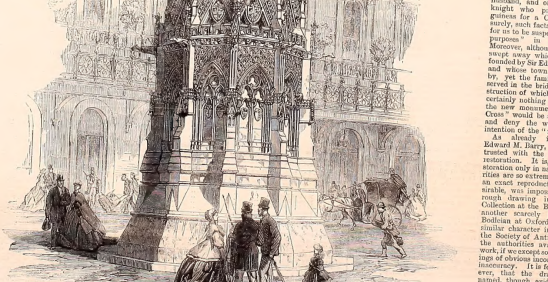
THE ELEANOR CROSS RESTORED AT CHARING-CROSS.

THE very beautiful cross, the erection of which before the new Charing cross Hotel is just completed, and of which we give an engraving, is designed as a restoration of a most interesting historical memorial. In what was once the village of Charing, and on the spot and by far the most costly, of the twelve crosses which marked the resting-places of the funeral procession which conveyed the body of Queen Eleanor, wife of Edward I., from the house of Robert de Wenton, at Hardby, in Nottinghamshire, where she died, to her tomb in Westminster Abbey. The resting-places, we may observe, were for be performed over the body at each night. The cross at Charing, like was swept away by iconoclastic Puritan bigotry in 1647, but its memory was preserved in the word "Cross" still retained for the site added to the proper name of the locality. Of the twelve original crosses only three remain—those of Waltham, Northampton, and Geddington; but these are amongst the most perfect and beautiful examples of Gothic art at the best period, and drew the warmest eulogy from the classic Flaxman. It speaks well also for the fertility of invention of their producers that they differ widely in design and the exquisitely sculptured effigy of the Queen on her tomb in Westminster Abbey, is greatly enhanced by the fact, ascertained on the discovery of the sarcophagus by the late Sir Gardner Wilkinson, that (with one possible exception) the dresses of the Queen's executors, that were in all probability English artists. Vertue and Walpole conjectured that the Eleanor crosses were designed by Pietro Cavallini, who, it was supposed, had been brought from Rome either by the Abbot of Westminster or the King himself; and "Toral," the sculptor of the latten effigy on the tomb, was long believed to be the sculptor of the Torelli. But dates and documents are alike against these assumptions, and Torel doubtless belonged to a family named in records from the days of the Confessor. Only one name rendered in the "accounts" as employed on the crosses is foreign—i. e., Dymenge de Leger. The memorials of Queen Eleanor, then, like the sculpture of Wells and Lincoln cathedrals, show us English native work, which, on comparison, will be found at least equal to that much-vaunted contemporary sculpture of Pisa in which we trace the earliest style of the Renaissance.



A most interesting discussion has lately taken place respecting the evidence for the popular tradition that the Eleanor crosses were erected by command of the King, as monuments of his conjugal affection. By-the-way, probably originating in this popular belief was the fanciful derivation of the name "Charing" from the French words chere Reine, "dear or beloved Queen!"—fanciful," we say, because the village of Charing is mentioned in records dating earlier than the erection of the cross. But the popular belief to which we have referred has been disputed since the discovery, about twenty years ago, of the already-mentioned accounts for the erection of all the memorials. These accounts were rendered to the Queen's executors, foremost among whom was, naturally, the King himself. Hence it has by Frayed from the Queen's own lords, therefore they were erected in pursuance of her own wishes. Edward himself, be it remembered, was at the time enormously in debt to the money-lending companies of Lombardy, and greatly embarrassed how to find means to prosecute the war with Scotland. Mr. Abel, author of "Memorials of Queen Eleanor" (an interesting work, embellished with photographs of the existing crosses), most admirably executed by Mr. Robert Hayward, of Finchley), favours the popular tradition, which is almost coeval with the uninterrupted existence of more than 500 years; for the tradition first appears in Thomas de Walsingham's Chronicles, some of which were written within one hundred years of the completion of the crosses; moreover, some of them are known to have been compiled from chronicles of still earlier date. Mr. Abel has also, since the publication of his book, adduced certain evidence as inferentially confirmatory of Walsingham's statement, from the "Annales de Dunstable," which date about the time the crosses were erected; but this particular evidence appears to us far from conclusive. Assuredly, however, it would not be difficult to frame a theory which should be reconcilable with the rendering of the accounts by the Queen's executors, and yet which should give Edward the credit of having erected the memorials. The fact of his embarrassment might even be used as an explanation of his appearing indirectly as an executor, as well as an assumption on the opposite side. But, without dwelling on any far-fetched assumption, we have only to suppose that the King was the residuary legatee of his wife's will, than which nothing is more probable, and that the residue which came to the King was disbursed on the memorials—which, surely, is also highly probable—and no obstacle whatever is opposed by the "accounts" to our retention of the time-honoured popular conviction. On the other hand, it is but fair to admit that sufficient time had elapsed for one of the many errors imported from popular tradition into the old chronicles, and often disproved by contemporary records, to have crept into Walsingham's compilation. There is, for example, strong contemporary negative evidence against the popular legend of Queen Eleanor sucking the poison from the King's wound. For mere testamentary directions in prospect of death for the funeral obsequies and the erection of votive testimonials of piety, memorial crosses, or whatever should invite a prayer for the soul of the deparied, at all contrary to precedent or the spirit of the time.

The Queen to whose memory, as we love to think, was erected, as tributes of a husband's affection, those crosses which have supplied the "motive" for the magnificent Albert Memorial in Hyde Park, was, there is every reason to believe, well deserving to be held in remembrance equally by her lord and people. Eleanor, or more correctly, if you will, Alianora of Castile, the daughter of Ferdinand III., and sister of Alphonso, King of Castile, was married to Prince Edward, at Burgos, in 1254, several years before either were, according to modern notions, "of age," throughout thirty-six years of wedded life, during which she bore fifteen children, Eleanor "the Faithful" seems to have been a pattern of wifehood; when queen, a model of gracious and beneficent sovereignty (for she was universally beloved); and, in short, the very ideal of a "woman of the time." Whether the story is or is not true of her sucking the poison from the wound her husband received from the assassin's blade at Acre, she certainly nursed the Prince till he recovered, and attended him during the whole of his absence from England with the Crusaders. It is recorded of her that, when remonstrated with on account of her avowed intention to accompany Edward whom God had joined; the read to Heaven is as short from Syria as from England." Indeed, she shared the cares and perils of all Edward's expeditions. She accompanied him to Wales, and she had followed him towards Scotland to the place of her death. Eight days did the King watch beside that death-bed; then, with such sacredness he addressed to the Abbot of Crossingham, and to which the prayers of him and his order were in terms which even now cannot be read without emotion. Besides the monuments of the two believed use able sculptor, Torel; one in the cathedral church of Blackfriars, which contained her heart; and another over her viscera in Lincoln Cathedral.

Such was the Queen, one of whose richest memorials was at Charing. It may be mentioned incidentally that, although crosses of various kinds were very common in the Middle Ages, and have been known to have marked the course of a funeral procession. Among bearers of the body of "St. Louis" from Paris to St. Denis. It is a significant fact that three crosses must, in all probability, have been seen by Edward and his Queen on the spot where one of these crosses was probably the most remarkable. Its erection took three years; and, whilst the cross at Waltham only cost £95, that at Charing cost almost £600, which, allowing for the great difference in the value of money, was a very large sum indeed. Besides the value of the of materials, these being for the most part Caen stone, marble being, however, used for the steps and some portions of the structure. On the destruction of the cross, "part of the stones," says Hasted, "were converted to pave Whitehall. I have seen knife hafts made of some of the stones, which, being well polished, looked like marble." The work was begun under the direction of Master Richard de Crundale, "cementarius," and who, dying in 1291, the charge of the was also much employed on the works then in progress at the Palace of Westminster. The reader will remark some curious analogies between the Crundales of the thirteenth and the Barrys of the nineteenth century. The sculpture of the Eleanor Crosses, at Waltham, Northampton, and elsewhere was executed by William de Ireland and Alexander D'Imagnistare, and it is recorded that the latter artist received five marks in part payment for the statues of Charing-cross.

The public must feel grateful to the Charing-cross Hotel Company for their liberality in seeking to rescue from oblivion so interesting a monument of bygone times. And even on the low commercial ground attracts visitors to the premises and heightens the prestige of the railway and of the hotel as a place of resort must tend to increase the traffic. Of course, for the sake of the old associations one would have preferred to have had the cross exactly on the original spot; and it would have had there been there, though assorting less, perhaps, with the present summa laus of Trafalgar-square than with the modern hotel by the same architect, but in a very different style, before which it actually stands. We trust that the apprehension of the cross being found in the way will not be realised. It is, however, a pity that a gigantic grille should have been erected as if recalling this beautiful monument from the millions who will pass it in the Strand. An attempt, and a very praiseworthy one, as we think, has been made to fix the claims of Hungerford on the new cross because it stands about a hundred yards east of the original site, and on ground once belonging to the Hungerford family. A letter assuming the attempt has been written to us by a representative of that family, complaining also of our having, some time since, in an archæological article, disputed the claim of the Hungerfords to such a commemoration by "garbling for sinister purposes" the family records; by "intentionally" suppressing its heraldic pages and adding only to these darkened with tragic mysteries and wild eccentricities," such as the stories of the wife of the house executed at Tyburn, for, as our correspondent terms it, the "aristocratic crime" of poisoning her husband, and of the extravagant knight who paid five hundred guineas for a Court wig. But, surely, such facts are too notorious for us to be suspected of "sinister purposes" in repeating them. Moreover, although the market is swept away which was originally founded by Sir Edward Hungerford, and whose town house was burnt down by, yet the family name is preserved in the bridge with the construction of which Sir Edward had certainly nothing to do. To call the new monument "Hungerford Cross" would be simply to ignore and deny the whole object and intention of the "restoration."

As already intimated, Mr. Edward M. Barry, A.R.A., was intrusted with the difficult task of restoration. It is, however, a restoration only in name; the authorities are so extremely scanty that an exact reproduction, even if desirable, was impossible. A very rough drawing is in the Crowle Collection at the British Museum; another scarcely better at the Bodleian at Oxford, and a third of similar character in the library of the Society of Antiquaries, are all the authorities available for the work, if we except some few engravings of obvious incompleteness and inaccuracy. It is fortunate, however, that the drawings above named, though evidently by unpractised hands, agree thoroughly together, and may therefore be regarded as tolerably safe guides for the leading principals of the design, number of niches, and other important features; though their very rude and unfinished execution necessarily left it to the architect to work, as he has done most successfully, in the spirit merely of his predecessor, and to supply the details from his own invention and knowledge of and feeling for thirteenth-century Gothic. Pennant, in the last edition of his "London," describes the cross as octagonal, and specially states that there were eight figures, which is double the number on any of the other crosses. The new cross follows Pennant in these particulars, and agrees, in its leading features, with the drawings above referred to. Its height to the top of the gilt copper cross by which it is surmounted is about 70 ft. The structure is of Portland stone; but the panels and shields of the lower story and the diapered tracery of the upper story are of red Mansfield stone. The gables, also, over the lower story are panelled with red Mansfield stone and Aberdeen granite. The mixture of materials gives great richness without presenting too startling contrasts between different portions of the design.

The sculpture has been ably executed from the architect's designs, by Mr. Thomas Earp. The almost Greek ideal of the monumental effigy (a cast of which was obtained for the guidance of the sculptor) has been reproduced in the eight beautiful crowned statues of the Queen in the upper story of the cross. Four of these statues represent Eleanor as Queen, with Royal insignia of crown, orb, and sceptre; and the other four with the attributes of a Christian woman—thus one figure carries a purse, out of which she distributes alms; another bread, for a similar purpose; whilst the others bear models of churches and religious houses, representing her as a foundress. At the feet of the statues are eight figures of kneeling angels, with their wings outstretched and their hands clasped as in prayer. The shields in the lower stage are accurately copied from those existing on the crosses of Waltham and Northampton and on the tomb, and consist of three varieties. The first displays three lions passant gardant, first assumed as the Royal arms of England by King Henry II. in 1154, and which still forms part of the Royal arms as borne by Queen Victoria. The second is that of Ponthieu, which Queen Eleanor bore in right of her mother, and simply consists of three bendlets within a bordure. The third shield represents the arms of Castile and Leon, arranged quarterly; and this is especially interesting, as being the representation of the earliest known quartering of arms. The arms of Castile are a castle, triple-towered; and those of Leon represent a lion rampant. The order of the shields accords with the arrangement at Northampton, Waltham, and Westminster. The diaper above the tracery in the lowest stage of the monument is composed of octagonal panels, richly undercut, representing alternately the castle of Castile and the lion rampant of Leon: the pillow and couch of the effigy has a similar design. The carving generally of the crockets, capitals, canopies, dispers, gargoyles, &c., agrees with the best remains of English thirteenth-century art; and much difficulty was, we are informed, experienced in finding carvers for the work in consequence of the now-fashionable prevalence of French and Italian types of decorative sculpture. A word of commendation is due to the contractor, Mr. Field, for the excellent and painstaking manner in which he has performed a task by which, we understand, he has been considerably a loser, as will be readily understood (by those conversant with the value of such work) when we say that the whole cost of restoring one of the chefs-d'œuvre of English Medieval art has not exceeded the sum of £1800. We are glad the monument is not "utilised" in any way: it is not a clock, a drinking-fountain, a telegraph, or postoffice. It is simply "Charing Cross."

In conclusion, it should be remarked that, although the enrichments are probably more elaborate than in the original cross, they always spring naturally out of the masses, and that these are distributed with the finest sense of the beautiful in proportion.

MONSIGNORE DE MÉRODE, LATE THE POPE'S MINISTER OF WAR.

THE dismissal, or retirement, about six weeks since, of the late Minister of War at Rome, Monsignore Xavier de Mérode, who had been the most zealous and uncompromising defender of the Pope's temporal dominion, and who was the author of General Lamoricière's unfortunate campaign in Umbria and the Marches of Ancona five years ago, has caused a certain amount of discussion. It appears that not only Cardinal Antonelli, the all-powerful Secretary of State, but the whole Court of Rome, feared to have Mérode in office at a moment when the evacuation of the Pontifical States by the French was commencing; as, with his impulsive character, it was felt that he might provoke a collision. A very considerable deficit, too, was discovered by the Minister of Finance in the accounts of the War Department, which is assigned as another reason for his fall. All that remains for Monsignore de Mérode to do is to leave Rome; and it is impossible for him, under existing circumstances, to remain. The Cardinal Secretary of State, meanwhile, has appointed a commission, which will summon the three Military Intendants—Agostini, Monari, and Terri—to give in their accounts. Luzzi, the Accountant of the Prisons, will be called on to do the same. Thus the whole administration of Monsignore de Mérode will be strictly overhauled; but no one suspects him of peculation or dishonesty, however great the irregularities and disorder which have prevailed among the subordinate officials under his control. The manner in which his disgrace was brought about is worthy of remark. Monsignore de Mérode had received some very plain hints, but was unwilling to resign. Cardinal Antonelli then intimated that it was the opinion of his Holiness that a journey was indispensably necessary to the health of Monsignore de Mérode. At first he asked for a leave of absence of a few weeks, but after having seen his Holiness he declared that the Pope had been deceived; that it was an intrigue of his enemies, and especially of that "Piedmontese and traitor" Antonelli; that the Pope was acting under pressure; that he retained his office for his Holiness; and, would never consent to leave voluntarily. On the evening of the 17th of October a note arrived from Monsignore de Stella, private secretary and friend of the Pope, which required that Signor Mario, Vice-Minister of War, should call on the Cardinal Secretary of State to attach his signature to certain documents. It was thus made known beyond doubt that Monsignore de Mérode had been displaced from the moment that he no longer signed official papers. Still his Excellency would not understand his position, and became perfectly furious. To tranquillise him the Pope sent to offer him the post of Monsignore Hohenlohe, who will probably be soon created a Cardinal—that is, the post of almoner to his Holiness, together with the promise of a cardinal's hat if he would leave voluntarily. Monsignor replied, "The Pope, Catholicity, God himself, have made me Minister of War, chief of the valiant defenders of the Holy See. I will be Minister of War or nothing. They may send me away, accompanied by gensdarmes, if they will; but I will not go voluntarily. Providence has placed me in this post, and the Catholic world has confirmed and sanctioned it. I must remain here. I will be dismissed; and let the Pope dismiss me if he dare." Upon this, Cardinal Antonelli sent to him to say that he was a "Revolutionist for resisting in such a mode the Holy Father." A very remarkable scene is then said to have ensued by those who are in a position to know what passes. The Belgian prelate ordered all his property to be carried to the Ministry of War, for fear of being replaced by a successor, intrenched himself within the apartment, and formed a kind of barricade with all the different articles which filled it up. A species of insanity had taken possession of Monsignore, who continued to sign papers in spite of the Pope and Antonelli. At last, on Friday evening, the 20th, a note from the Secretary of State, in the name of his Holiness, signed Antonelli, relieved Monsignore from his duties, or, to speak clearly, dismissed him. On the following morning de Mérode called together the employés of his Ministry, and in a broken voice announced he had been dismissed, and thanked them for their zeal and co-operation. The Pope grants him a hundred scudi a month as pension, and he is succeeded as Minister of War by General Kanzler, a Swiss officer, who will be more subservient to Cardinal Antonelli. Monsignore de Mérode is a younger brother of the Count de Mérode, a Belgian nobleman of ancient family and large estates. He is undoubtedly a sincere though fanatical adherent of the falling sovereignty of Rome, but his violent and ill-judged measures have helped to hasten its downfall.
